THE BATTLES AT CHICKAMAUGA.

Graphic Account of the Two Days' Fighting.

The Observations of an Eye-Witness.

Casualties Among the Field and Staff Officers.

The following highly interesting description of the late battles in Northern Georgia is copied from the Cincinnati Gazette of Friday last. It is dated on the battle-field Monday, the 21st, just after the close of the contest, and gives facts of which the telegraphic accounts have made no mention:

When Friday night came few expected a battle next day; but the movements of THOMAS and McCOOK toward the left, commenced this time and carried on under cover of the darkness, indicated to the reflecting that the rebel foe was still menacing our line of communication with Chattanooga, and that a final position was about to be taken up for the purpose of defending this line and giving battle to the enemy if he desired it; for, it was not our intention to fight if we could just as well avoid it. I say this with great confidence. Of course Gen. ROSECRANS has not told me of his designs, neither has any one whom I might consider authorized to speak for him. But so great is my reliance upon the wisdom and generalship of ROSECRANS, so much in our case was to be gained by delay; so evident was it that the enemy had aimed against us almost half our entire available force, making him, for the time, too strong for us; so plain was it that behind the fortifications at Chattanooga was our best position for defensive purposes; so serious indeed were a historical reverse when we should just then have avoided a battle, that I think I run no hazard of contradiction from official sources when I assert, that if Gen. ROSECRANS could have honorably postponed an engagement with the enemy he would unquestionably have done so. But the enemy had collected what he believed to be a sufficient force to crush our gallant army; the necessities of his situation would not allow him to wait; he could easily turn our flanks by reason of his superior numbers; he knew that we could not afford under any circumstances to allow him to go between us and Chattanooga; he saw his opportunity, and he determined to seize it.

All night long on Friday night the movement of THOMAS' corps continued; CRITTENDEN's was already in the position it was intended to hold the next day, so that THOMAS passed it by and placed his divisions upon the left of the line, Gen. NEGLEY being in position at Owens' Ford, higher up the valley, for the purpose of preventing the enemy from coming into the breach which THOMAS' movement would leave in our line. Gen. JOHNSON's division, of McCOOK's corps, reported to Gen. THOMAS, and marched with him to take position upon the left of CRITTENDEN. Gen. DAVIS' 3rd Division, in the meantime, moving as rapidly as possible toward the left, so as to connect with the right of CRITTENDEN, and thus complete the line, which would be much shorter than it was the day before.

A night march of a large body of troops is a solemn thing. The soldiers scarcely speak a word to each other, the animals move with a dull, mechanical motion which hardly resembles life; the rattle of the wagon wheels seems strangely muffled, and almost the only sound you recognize is the heavy, measured awful tramp of thousands of flying men.

For the first half of the night during which the march I am referring to took place, everything was comfortable enough, but near midnight it turned freezingly cold, and as it was necessary, after passing Gen. CRITTENDEN, for us to feel our way with cautious long weariness halts took place, during which, although honest the soldiers immediately upon our front and rights flank. The boys who were not skirmishing beetling very cold during these halts, began to kindle fires at every stopping place to warm themselves. At first they made these fires of logs of wood and rails taken from the neighboring fences, but afterward they ceased to trouble themselves about removing the rails and set fire to the fences themselves wherever they chanced to stop. In the course of an hour or two the fires stretching all along the Lafayette road illuminated the clouds above, and shed a ruddy glare upon the sleeping troops, lying by like an army of specters.

At last the weary march came to an end, the artillery was wheeled into position, and the marching column facing to the right stood in order of battle looking toward the east.

An hour or two longer and the sun arose in glory, thawed the crisp white frost which had collected upon the grass, dispersed the mists that had gathered around the low grounds, and bathed the world in a flood of golden light, into the valley of the Chickamauga showed at least two-thirds of the entire Union army, drawn up in battle array. Not that any individual save old Sol could see them all, for the peculiar nature of the ground, covered almost everywhere with thick woods, rendered it impossible in many places to see even the whole of a single regiment.

As soon as the sun was fairly risen, I mounted my horse, intending to ride to the extreme left of our line, and thence proceed from left to right, to see as much of the country as possible before the fight, or rather work of the day should commence. Riding about a mile, I saw troops coming into the rear from the woods to the east of it, and had it not perceived through my glass that they were dressed in blue, I should have judged from the direction whence they came that they were a portion of the rebel army. Suddenly I saw a courier shoot out from the crowd and coming toward me, hatless and with frantic speed. As he came, I drew rein a couple from the wide-eyed fellow, who, when he had ridden half a dozen miles. But the citizen wanted to get back, the courier said he ought to be back, and my orders in that direction were absolutely imperative. So we separated.

At the very first note of danger our citizen friend turned his horse toward Chattanooga, I did not blame him much. He had been sixteen miles from home, escaping to the enemy, and in all probability his proximity to the rebels caused lively images of a scaffold and halter to dance through his brain.

My vagabonding friend continued with me although he became exceedingly, and at last provokingly silent.

"Are you going back to them now?" I inquired of the courier.

"I am," he replied, "but it is hazardous business, for the woods just on the other side of that open field are filled with sharpshooters, who fire at any one passing along the road; just now they had quite a volley at me as I came through."

As I wished to reach these troops of Gen. GARFIELD, in order to learn from them what had been doing the day before, this answer was a little discouraging. Nevertheless my curiosity finally prevailed over my apprehensions, and myself and the courier started back upon a full gallop. Of course the sharpshooters paid their respects, and more than one bullet whistled uncomfortably close in our ears while we were running this dangerous gauntlet. But fortunately none of them hit either of us although one cut the hair from my horse's mane.

Scarcely had I reached our troops in safety, when an order from Gen. ROSECRANS, which had reached Gen. GARFIELD by another route, directed the two brigades of infantry at once to Rossville; to get a supply of rations for two days, and hold themselves in readiness to march at a moments notice. As the Chickamauga, of other rebels rendered it somewhat difficult just then to count Gen. BARIN's men, who were moved to the right, I rode back with Gen. GARFIELD's troops, and ascertained for the edification of Rosville until the events of battle in the afternoon whence I had come, attracted my attention. A wild gallop back to the left immediately ensued. I was accompanied in the ride by a member of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, attached to Gen. ROSECRANS' headquarters, and a citizen who had accompanied us in the morning on an excursion of pleasure for the purpose of gaining knowledge of the surrounding country.

All three of us agreed that it was a hazardous experiment to attempt making our way back to the army, the nearer portion of which was distant half a dozen miles. But the citizen wanted to get back, the engineer said he ought to be back, and my orders in that direction were absolutely imperative. So we started.

At the very first note of danger our citizen friend turn which toward Chattanooga. I did not blame him much. He had been sixteen miles from home escaping to the enemy, and in all probability his proximity to the rebels caused lively images of a scaffold and halter to dance through his brain.

My vagabonding friend continued with me although he became exceedingly, and at last provokingly silent.

A few miles riding brought us to the vicinity of the appointed battle-field, and then we heard heavy cannonading which always down from a hillside. For a time we skirted the base of a mountain, on the top of which the rebels had established a signal station, with keen apprehension, and with reason.

One said the battle had been going on several hours, and our arrival was not with thunder along the whole line.

Another declared this although unsuccessful at first, our troops at length recovered their ground, and were now driving the enemy.

Here is a man with an arm roughly bandaged and very bloody. The blood had dried upon it and hangs to it in great black cloth. "Who fire you?" "Private ——, of the Thirty-eighth Indiana." "What news, there?" "Bad, very bad, I thought." "Has your regiment been in the fight?" "Yes, if I has not no one has." "With what result?" "One third of my number killed and wounded." "Where did they whipped?" "Our brigade was left unsupported, overpowered by numbers, and compelled for a time to give way." "Is Col. STARNES safe?" "So far as I know, he is."

Another, with a ghastly wound in the head, his upon his jacket the red stripes which show him to be an artilleryman. "Whose battery do you belong to?" "Guensey's." "Why that is the regular battery belonging to Gen. King's brigade; what has it been doing?" "It has all been taken by the rebels." "Can that be possible?" "It is, but I have been since that it was retaken." "How came it to be lost?" "The infantry supports gave way, and the horses being nearly all killed of course the guns were captured."

The stream grew stronger and stronger, straggler were run over by wagons dashing down toward the rear. Ambulances, filled with wounded, came long and fast. Men with wounds of every imaginable description not affecting their locomotion, came straggling by on foot, the shoulders of those who had been shot in their lower limbs, hobbled slowly on through blinding masses of dust, which, at times, concealed everything from view.

At length we reached the hospital for Gen. BARIN's division. The house in which he stands has been the outhouses had been brought into requisition, and large numbers of sufferers were lying on the ground in the yard. In one corner was an operating table, beneath which lay the usual quantity of legs, arms, hands, feet, fingers and toes. Here and there among the wounded were some cold and still, the sod of death upon their countenances. These had died a few being carried to the yard.

During all this time the roar of battle in front of us never ceased for a moment, and now we began to get authentic intelligence of the progress and fortunes of the fight.

The flame of battle had first broken out upon the extreme left, where Gen. BARIN's division was posted. The troops composing it behaved most gallantly; some of the regiments had covered themselves with glory, but they were compelled to retire at length, leaving uncovered the left flank of Gen. BARIN, upon which the enemy at once threw himself with great force.

The brigade commanded by Col. S. F. SCHERER, Thirty-eighth Indiana, one of the very best in the army, was left particularly exposed, as its right flank had been somewhat long far advanced when it had taken position in the morning. Almost before its pickets were driven in, it found itself literally surrounded by thrice its number, who came on with their infernal yells, pouring volley after volley of deadly bullets into the very bosom of this gallant brigade. For a moment it was thrown into confusion, and that moment sufficed to place the rebels upon its front, flanks and rear. But it was not destined to surrender. The Second, Thirty-third and Ninety-fourth Ohio; the Thirty-eighth Indiana, the Tenth Wisconsin and Loomis' battery are composed of the best material in these respective States, and their commander, SCHERER, had succeeded in infusing into them his own magnanimous and gallant spirit. Gathering together they broken ranks under the infernal fire which every instant mowed them down, and following their heroic leader, they charged the dense legions surrounding them, and like a whirlwind in a forest, tore their way through.

But, alas! the guns of the immortal First Michigan battery were left behind—those black, stern-looking rifled cannon, each one of whom I had come to regard with a feeling of almost reverential awe, because upon a dozen battlefields I had seen them dealing destruction into the ranks of traitors, and never knew them once turned against a legion of my country's enemies which they did not scatter like leaves before the blast. Even in the opinion of the rebels themselves, Loomis and his fifteen guns are invisible. Eyes were commanded near by a young man, who, possessing naturally the nobler qualities, had thoroughly learned the lessons of his teacher, and promised to prove a fleet worthy of so noble one. Lieut. VAN PATTEN, his gallant lieutenant, fell in his place with the same unselfish devotion which he manifested for his wife in the desperate conflict which broke around Sumner's brigade, he managed the battery with such dexterity and coolness, and for some moments rocked the very iron over the heads of the rebels by the fury blows he gave them. But the forces were too unequal to last long, artillerists were killed or wounded. The infantry supporting him had been compelled to turn and cut their way through the enemy, and a horde of rebels rushed up to the muzzles of the now speechless pieces. Lieut. PATTEN, now almost alone, stationed himself in front of them and drew his sword. "Boys, he said, we are not to cause these guns." The inhuman barbarians, unable to appreciate true heroism, brutally murdered him where he stood. The history of the war furnishes but few instances of more daring prowess, whether we look at the act or Lieut. VAN PATTEN.

All the guns of the battery save one fell into the enemy's hands.

Along the entire line of the left and center there were similar instances of heroism, only two or more of which I have time to mention.

At one time the guns of the Fourth Indiana battery, Capt. BUSS, were all in the hands of the enemy, but most gallantly and unexpectedly, by a slender charge of the infantry and artillerymen. This battery is attached to Gen. STARKWEATHER's brigade.

During the fierce assault upon the Fifty-sixth and the Second Ohio, being in ecstasies, was called by Gen. BARIN in person, and led back to a most effective charge.

Maj. Gen. G. J. RANSOM, who combines the chivalrous courage of an olden knight, with the cool, calm ability of a ROSENCRANS, had time not only to keep his own division in effective order, but to give his generous assistance to other portions of the line. The tremendous onslaught of the enemy broke Gen. PALMER's line, and scattered several of his regiments in wild dismay toward the rear. Among these was the Sixth Ohio, which, in charge of the fine spirited Anderson, had up to this moment nobly maintained its ground. Gen. RANSOM, perceiving the danger, quick as lightning threw himself among the brave but broken Guthries.

"Boys," he shouted, "are you the soldiers of the Sixth Ohio, who fought with Marshal Cheat Mountain? You never turned your backs upon traitors in Virginia. Will you do it now?"

"No, no," they screamed, almost frantically. "Lead us back. Lead us back."

From every quarter came rushing up the scattered fragments of the regiment, with magic swiftness they reformed the ranks, with Gen. RANSOM at their head they charged the insolent enemy, and after a moment's struggle every rebel in front of them not killed or wounded was in confused retreat.

The examples of the Sixth Ohio was communicated to the flying fragments of other regiments, and it is a fact which will long be memorable in the history of this battle, that these rallied strangers, principally from Palmer's division, reformed ranks almost of their own accord, and drove back the enemy who had been victoriously pressing on.

But I cannot linger to gather up these scattered facts. Let me endeavor to give a brief and succinct view of the course of events on Saturday, and the part in it of the great drama of the succeeding day.

The shifting of THOMAS' corps during the night of Friday placed it on the left of the line in the following order: BARIN's division on the extreme left, then next, and RANSOM next. Reserve was resting. Wood was holding the ravine of Owen's Ford and the position of Gordon's Mill, which had now become our extreme right. One division of McCOOK's corps (Johnson's) having come up to the new line sooner than the rest, reported to THOMAS for orders, and was assigned to a position upon the left between Baird and Reynolds. Two divisions of Gen. CRITTENDEN's held the center of the line, Palmer on the right, Reynolds on the left. Van Cleve, next to Palmer, then the brigade, Beatty, Davis and Sheridan, of McCOOK's corps, were rapidly marched toward the left to complete the line and take position on the right of Van CLEVE. Generally, the line lost the direction of the Chickamauga, withdrawn upon the left so as to cover for a considerable distance the course of the Lafayette road, which runs directly north and south.

The rebels had been maneuvering all day on Friday to find the position of Gordon's Mill, and seeing its great strength had mustered our left flank, attempted to drive the express purpose of compelling Gen. ROSECRANS to abandon that place. As the fact must be presented actually, their attempt partially succeeded, and the desperate fighting of Saturday resulted in our retreat on Friday night, as far as united their designs. But it rendered our own left so strong that it became impossible for the rebels to turn it, as they had all along hoped to do. The attempt of our part to hold Gordon's Mill after this transfer, perhaps occasioned the great slaughtering of our troops, and consequently let in upon us by. True, it looked quite well to allow the enemy from fighting in the right, but we simple withdrawal of our right wing to the Rossville Ridge, although it in fact were, would have fully accomplished the end in view.

Early on Saturday morning, the battle was opened by the rebels, who, in the dense fog, had crept up quietly in the night, and placed a battery in position on our left, which was soon answered by our own. The fog was so dense that the gunners could see but a few yards in front of their pieces, and the fire was random and ineffectual. Gen. THOMAS, at the head of his brigade, charged into the rebel lines and cut his way out again, bringing with him two hundred prisoners. Other portions of this brave band followed THOMAS' example, until the legions of the enemy were fairly driven back to the ground they occupied previous to commencing the last fight. Thus did twelve or fifteen thousand men, animated by heroic impulses and inspired by worthy leaders, save from destruction the Army of the Cumberland. Let the nation honor them as they deserve!

At night Gen. THOMAS fell back to Rossville, four miles from Chattanooga, strong and in which city the army lies to-night.

Our losses have been most severe, and can scarcely fall short of 1,700 killed and 8,000 wounded. Col. BARNES tells me that our loss in artillery will not fall short of fifty pieces. Our deficiency in transportation and baggage cannot now be estimated.

But the enemy has suffered as severely as we, in fact which he can ill afford. Bragg has staked his all. He intended by massing all his available forces together, to annihilate the Army of the Cumberland. He has failed to do so, and although it would be childish to deny or conceal our own fearful losses, yet we may console ourselves by the assurance that in his circumstances his failure to destroy us is for us a signal victory, and for him an irreparable defeat.

GEN. ROSECRANS' ARMY.

FAVORABLE NEWS REPORTED.

The Enemy Evinces no Disposition to Attack.

CHEERFUL FEELING IN WASHINGTON.

REPORTS FROM CINCINNATI.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, Sept. 26.

The Republican says:

"The Government has received glorious news from Gen. ROSECRANS, but the details cannot be stated.

The rebel army, from the latest telegrams, had not, it appears, molested Gen. ROSECRANS in his present position.

There is in Washington a general spirit of cheerfulness regarding future military movements."

COL. WILDER'S REPORT.

CINCINNATI, Saturday, Sept. 26.

Col. WILDER, who has arrived at Nashville, from Chattanooga, says the Gen. LONGSTREET has arrived on the care from Virginia while the battle was opening. He estimates our losses as very heavy, but he reports that matters in the front are much more favorable than is believed at the North.

The City of Nashville is full of the relatives of wounded soldiers.

Passes to Chattanooga are not easily obtained.

Mr. BOGMAN, bridge builder from Chicago, arrives with 60 men on Thursday night, and will proceed to bridge the Tennessee River at Bridgeport, which will open railroad communication all the way to Chattanooga.

OPERATIONS IN TENNESSEE.

Burnside's Army in a Position to Prevent a Flank Movement by the Enemy.

CINCINNATI, Saturday, Sept. 26.

Yesterday's Nashville Union says:

"Gen. BURNSIDE has reached the point where he was expected to prevent the flank movement of the enemy.

Brig. Gen. PALMER and his rebel officers captured at Cumberland Gap to Gen. BURNSIDE, have arrived at Johnson's Island.

SHOCKING RAILROAD CASUALTY.

Five Persons Killed and Twenty-two Wounded—The Affair Caused by Drunken Reckless.

CHICAGO, Saturday, September 26.

At 6 o'clock last evening a special train, consisting of a locomotive and twenty cars, left Kalamazoo, bound West. While coming down the four-mile grade between Matteawan and Lawton, some drunken rowdies near the rear end of the train cut the bell rope and pulled out a link between the cars, thus dividing the train.

Being upon the down grade the engineer did not discover his loss of a portion of the train, and did not stop until he reached Lawton.

Within two minutes afterwards the rear portion of the train came thundering down the grade.

The engineer, in endeavoring to get away with his portion of the train safely, put on steam with such force as to break the coupling between the engine and the cars.

A collision immediately ensued between the two portions of the train, and led to relate, five persons were killed and twenty-two wounded. Some of the latter are so seriously injured that their recovery is impossible.

It is to be hoped that the drunken authors of this disaster will meet the punishment they deserve.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

An Onward Movement—The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Seized by Government—Rebels Almost Dethroned.

Notwithstanding the earnest suggestion of the War Department that no mention should be made at this time by the newspapers of movements in the Army of the Potomac, the Sunday Post, last evening, published the following:

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post:

WASHINGTON, Saturday, Sept. 26.

The Army of the Potomac is in motion; transports are loading with great activity at Alexandria, and it is expected that a considerable body of troops will embark with as little delay as possible. Early destination can only be conjectured.

Meanwhile, there is no less activity shown in the forwarding of troops in another direction. The Government has taken possession of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and no more travel for civil purposes is allowed upon it. Some important movement is contemplated on the line of this great thoroughfare.

Little certainty will be gained much, in fact, in the purpose of the information that we receive from various sources, which, however, we can well be the basis of Rosecrans. Gen. Rosecrans now is in Richmond almost dethroned.

There is no doubt of the fact that a large number of troops are remaining for the country of the rebel capital.

Gen. Meade has reported to Gen. Thomas for duty, he was sent by the latter to bring over an ammunition train from the Rossville road. The train had fallen into the hands of the enemy, but the march in search of it brought Meade and his men into contact with the rebels, and a desperate conflict immediately ensued.

Nobly did all pass through the ordeal, and although twice thrown into confusion by the concentrated fire from a score of rebel regiments and half as many batteries, they rallied once the first, and drove the enemy from a hill almost as formidable as that which formed the key of Gen. Thomas' position. The rebels made and desperate endeavor to retake the position, but were bloodily repulsed, and almost for the first time since the fight began (Meade was left in the rear) the rebels were driven back in confusion, leaving the wounded and dying on the contested field. At the accession front of the hill, in the hollows and ravines at the night, and away to the left, upon and beyond the Lafayette road the rebel legions were seen assembling for the onset.

At last a shell came hurtling through the air, and burst with a loud explosion over the hills. This was the signal for revel attack, and at once the battle raged fiercely, and lasted for an hour.

The fight around the hill now raged with better experienced, before even since this terrible day. Our soldiers were formed in two lines, and as each rebel regiment came up to the front and fired a deadly volley into our ranks, the first fell back a little ways, the men lay down upon the ground to load their guns, and the second line advanced to take their place. The rebels, meanwhile, came back, and delivering their withering volleys, fell back, they were grey, they were blue, they were black. And all the time not a man wavered. Every motion was executed with as much precision as if they were on a holiday parade, movement, standing the fire of the rebel army were burning upon the foot of the hill, and a score of cannon more thunder from the hill-top behind. Every attempt of the rebels to scale the hill was repulsed, and the gallant Hazzard looked with pride upon his men, standing or of troops left remaining for the country of the rebel capital.

But such troops are no longer satisfied with the defensive. Gen. Thomas, at the head of his brigade, charged into the rebel lines and cut his way out again, bringing with him two hundred prisoners. Other portions of this brave band followed Thomas's example, until the legions of the enemy were fairly driven back to the ground they occupied previous to commencing the last fight. Thus did twelve or fifteen thousand men, animated by heroic impulses and inspired by worthy leaders, save from destruction the Army of the Cumberland. Let the nation honor them as they deserve!

THE CASE OF THE PETERHOFF.

Our Side of the Controversy—History of the Case—Grounds of Condemnation—English Judicial Decisions in Kindred Cases.

Argument of E. Delafield Smith, U. S. District Attorney.

Addressed to the United States Court at New-York.

This address is extracted from a stenographic report of the trial in the case of the prize steamer Peterhoff, which has been printed by private persons for transmission to Europe:

MAY IT PLEASE THE COURT: This case is clothed with profound interest in the public mind, both of Europe and America. It is brought to the bar of a Court, commissioned by the Government of a great country, and charged with the determination and application of international law. Not solely individuals, but nations are parties to this controversy. Not alone an august judicial tribunal at Washington, but the imperial Courts of a distant continent, will sit in review of the judgment which shall be pronounced here. Yet the testimony spread upon this record is within a narrow scope. The facts marshaled before us are few. A decision may be reached without straining the eye in search of precedents beyond such familiar adjudications as have long ago sunk to the level margin of an elementary treatise. It is true, indeed, that consequences of magnitude have become entangled in the issue. But for them, the world might well wonder that so simple a case should have so aroused the populace of one country, and so interested the publicists of many.

THE MAIN QUESTION.

Was the recent enterprise of the Peterhoff lawful or fraudulent? Was her voyage lawful or illegal? Was her destination real or simulated?

In deciding the issue involved in this capture, two classes of facts demand attention. First, such as are of a public character, too general to require specific proof, and sufficiently notorious to come, of their own force, within the range of unaided judicial cognizance. And, secondly, those established by the testimony taken in the preparatory, consisting of the responses of witnesses to the standing interrogatories administered by the Prize Commissioners, together with such light as an inspection of the ship's papers and of her cargo may throw upon the intent of those by whom her course has been directed.

CHARACTER OF THE WAR.

In the Summer of 1861 the foundations of this land trembled with an earthquake of territorial war. The country was aroused as from a sleep. Guards, of her own appointment, still lingering in her high places, were prepared to trample out her life if she lay still, and to assassinate her if she arose. Perjured treachery and audacious force vied with each other to destroy a Government, which discovered its worst enemies among the most pampered and caressed of the children of her protection. The war was not for a boundary, a province, or a form of government. Its purpose, sorrowfully seen at home, was to annihilate the unity and life of the nation. Its consequences, greedily predicted abroad, were to open the best portion of the Western hemisphere to insolent foreign footsteps, which periodically humiliate the States of Mexico and South America. It was a rising, not to overthrow tyranny, but to establish it. Guilty leaders and deluded communities elected to reproduce the drama of the American revolution, making Oppression perform now the part that Liberty enacted then.

THE BLOCKADE AND ITS VIOLATORS.

Words and acts of attempted conciliation were wasted. Awakened to its own defence, the Government is forced, at length, to the arbitrament of war. The Executive establishes a blockade of the insurrectionary ports. The Emperor of the French, dreaming of his personal aggrandizement, and hating the principles of republican government, weaves wily arts for our embarrassment; and Britain, without his excuse, green with jealousies which our ovations to her Prince should have cleansed away, whets with the scythe of national animosity the cupidity of her traders. Government and people, emulating each the bad faith of the other, hasten to confer rights upon one belligerent and to heap wrongs upon the other. Ships, clad in iron, start from her docks to prey upon the merchant marine of a friendly Power, while vessels crowd the harbor of New-York flying the red signals of England, to the exclusion of the flag which was once the protection of American commerce. In defiance of the public law of the world, English bottoms infest our southern seas, violate the belligerent right of blockade, and bear food, medicines and arms to the enemies of human freedom and of stable government.

THE NAVY AND THE COURTS.

Such was the situation of public affairs, when the naval forces and the Federal Courts of the United States, the one with unstring energy, the other with intelligent firmness, surrounded with increasing hazards the bold breaches of blockade, and the wholesale indulgences in contraband trade, with which this unnatural conflict was fostered and prolonged.

NEUTRAL PRETENSIONS.

Then cunning greed invoked frauds and subterfuges, to do by indirection what had proved at length too dangerous and impracticable for the open acts of enterprise. The little harbor of Nassau, in the island of New-Providence; the port of Cardenas, on the northerly coast of Cuba; and, at last, the unfrequented region of Matamoras, in Mexico, are magnified into vast marts of trade, and become the rivals of Liverpool, Havre and New-York. Ships of ponderous tonnage traverse the seas and swarm in the vicinity of these inconsiderable places. Owners, shippers and masters, with remarkable effrontery, claim that they are centres, of substantial, legitimate and independent trade. At the same time, the common sense and common knowledge of the world acknowledge that they are mere stopping-places and ports of transhipment, by or through which munitions of war and articles of necessity, of comfort and of luxury, may be carried from the British Isles to the insurgent section of the American Union. So the British bark Springbok sets her sheets sails for Nassau. So the British schooner Stephen Hart turns an honest face toward Cardenas. And thus, we say, the steamer Peterhoff pursues her virtuous pathway to Matamoras. But the rough sailor follows in the track of each. He sees through the thin disguises. He throws aside the flimsy veil. He arrests the pretender and sends her where she must submit to the scrutiny of a court of justice.

FRAUD AND RESISTANCE.

In the light, then, of the notorious fraud, the deception, the already the indication, with which this contraband trade, to the Southern ports has been projected and persisted in, we approach the proofs in the case now under consideration. The intelligent examination of the testimony now before us can be attempted, without a recognition of the public facts to which I have adverted.

ARTS OF THE PETERHOFF.

Setting, under such circumstances, it must be conceded that the Peterhoff, if guilty, would shroud her purpose in the depths of dissimulation; and, if innocent, would fan in to the light of frankness. We shall observe, in the course of our inquiry, how much she has displayed of the one, and how little of the other.

AN OLD OFFENDER.

It appears that this steamer, immediately succeeding her late adventure, had been the subject of an agreement between Messrs. Trazenna, Kastner and Wilkes and Dennison, purchasers, extensively engaged in shipments to the so-called Confederate States, to run the blockade, and to carry out the intent of the parties, the steamer was to be chartered to the Government of the Confederate States, and to be used in the service of the Confederate States, and to be used in the service of the Confederate States, and to be used in the service

States. In that agreement, it was provided that she should transport a cargo of merchandise for the "Confederate States," and deliver it by running the blockade, if possible, or by sailing to the port of Nassau or Bermuda, and she was to return with a cargo of cotton produced in the "Confederate States." PEARSON seems to have been her owner. This contract was performed in a voyage to Nassau, and return to London with a cargo of Confederate cotton.

OWNERS AND CONSIGNEES.

The Peterhoff appears to have been built in Great Britain, is now registered in the name of JOSEPH SPENCE, of London, and is rated of the burthen of [illegible]. Her regular trade appears to have been that of a trader between London and Nassau. Her last regular voyage was put on board in December, 1862, and January, 1863, by twenty-six different shippers. A large quantity was consigned "to order," and the remainder to three passengers, RENDATE, BOWDEN and ALMOND, on their order. These three passengers were in the ship at the time of the capture. The entire cargo is ostensibly destined, by the bills of lading, to "off the Rio Grande, for Matamoras, to be taken over the bar in lighters." The cargo is a general assorted one, a large portion, however, being contraband of war, there being more or less contraband in every shipment.

VOYAGE AND CAPTURE.

She cleared from London, ostensibly for Matamoras, March 1st, of the 5th of January, 1863. No criticism is provoked by her papers. Leaving London, she called at Plymouth, England, where she lay some seven or eight days, and left about the 20th of January. Compelled to put back to Falmouth, she sailed thence on the 27th of January, and proceeded to the Island of St. Thomas, coaled, remained five days, and again set sail on the 25th of February. Before entering that port she was boarded, but released, by the United States steamer Alabama. And after leaving St. Thomas, when about four miles out from the harbor, she was visited and captured by the United States steamer Vanderbilt. It will be observed that the commander of the Peterhoff, although properly and respectfully summoned, had refused to proceed with the papers of his vessel for examination on board the Vanderbilt.

A PRIZE IN NEW-YORK.

The prize was taken to Key West, Florida, but no court being at the time in session at that place, the British Consul requested that she should be conveyed to a Northern port, and she was brought to New-York for adjudication. Arriving here on the 26th of March, the ship and cargo were libeled on the 30th, and the process was made returnable on the 21st of the ensuing April. The claims and answers were filed upon that day. They have been read, and I need not stop to restate their contents.

NATURE OF THE LADING.

I have said that the lading contained more or less of contraband of war in nearly every shipment. The report filed by the special commission appointed by the Court to make an examination and inventory of the cargo, contains the following language:

"That a very large portion of the said cargo will be found, on an examination of the inventory, to consist of articles adapted to army use; that large number of cases contain Blucher boots, which are known at army shoes; a number of cases contain cavalry boots, and are so labeled, samples of said labels being herein annexed; that one hundred and ninety-two bales of the said cargo consist of gray blankets, adapted to the use of an army, and are believed to be such as are used in the United States' army; ninety-five casks contain horseshoes; one hundred and ninety-five cases contain horseshoes; one hundred and ninety-five casks contain horseshoes; a large size, thirty-six cases of a large size, containing artillery harness in sets for four horses, with two riding saddles attached to each set. There were also on board two hydraulic presses, in pieces, adapted for cotton. That a considerable portion of said cargo consists of drugs, directed BURCHARD & CO., successors, Matamoras, Mexico; in which, among an assorted lot of drugs, quinine, calomel, morphine and chlorodyne form an important portion."

The inventory shows, also, coiled rope, boxes of tin, of sheet zinc, of hoop and of bar iron, anvils and bellows, and other articles of a contraband character not specified in the special statement of the Commissioners.

SUPPLIES FOR THE REBELS.

In reason and upon principle, where it is enough to reduce an enemy by a rigid blockade, the list of articles properly embraced within the description of contraband, must be enlarged. For, in that case, the materials necessary to sustain the military operations of the enemy are multiplied. The cargo of this steamer, would perhaps, prove more vitally necessary to the belligerent operations of the so-called Confederacy than arms. This statement meets the query why, if this cargo was destined to Texas, articles more decidedly characterized as munitions of war are not found. This objection is answered still more forcibly by the very theory already adverted to. The ship was upon a guilty and suspicious errand. Visitations and searches were inevitable. Her lading must not be so palpably and unequivocally designed for the rebel Confederacy as to admit of no disguise.

A CONTRABAND TRADE.

I submit, upon all the proofs, that the Peterhoff was captured in the act of carrying contraband to the enemy; that this act was accompanied with a false destination; that the owner and master of the ship, and every shipper of the cargo, must be charged with privity to the contraband; that such of the lading as is innocent and that which is contraband, have common owners; and that, therefore, upon settled principles relating to contraband of war, the entire cargo, together with the ship, is lawful prize, and subject to a judgment of condemnation.

A BLOCKADE RUNNER.

The case of the claimants is not sensibly bettered, if we turn from the doctrine of contraband to the law of blockade. An examination of the testimony leaves upon the mind a legal and moral conviction that the ship was bound to such port of Texas as she might conveniently enter, and that a Mexican harbor would not be sought unless as a place of refuge or necessity.

SHIFTING PURPOSES.

What has been thought by English jurists of a shifting purpose like this, which determines to sin if you can, and to be virtuous if you must, may be seen by a reference to the words of Lord STOWELL, in the case of an American ship, the "Richmond," in the 6th of Robinson. The language referred to is at page 300.

REBEL LIGHTERS.

Nor would it be less a breach of blockade to anchor at the mouth of the Rio Grande, unless her cargo into rebel lighters, and thus effect its transportation to Brazos de Santiago, to Brownsville, or to some other convenient point either upon the coast of Texas, or along the American side of the river just mentioned.

A SCHEME OF SMUGGLING.

This last scheme was undoubtedly the purpose and expectation of the projectors and executors of the enterprise. That this mode of smuggling into the insurrectionary territory the necessaries, comforts and luxuries of life, as well as arms and munitions of war, is continually and systematically practiced by British traders and navigators, is notorious. All the special facts and circumstances of this undertaking unite with the general course of things to brand the Peterhoff with this double violation of the public law of the world. The principles, therefore, both of blockade and of contraband unite in the judgment which must await the conclusion of this investigation.

NEUTRAL RIGHTS.

I do not seek to deny and I do not forget the right of trade between neutral Powers. I concede that England, during the existing war, is not prohibited by public law from conducting a legitimate trade with Mexico. I think such trade, if legitimate, may be carried on through Matamoras, notwithstanding the proximity of that port to the rebel harbor of Brownsville.

BROADER COURSE ON NEUTRAL TRADE.

It is true, that in the case of the Zelden Rust, decided in 1805, reported in the 6th of Robinson, 82, a cargo of Dutch cheese—held to be contraband of war, (in accordance with the decision made in 1799 in the case of the Jonge Margaretha, 1st Robinson, 189,) as going to a place of naval equipment and fit for naval use, and which was taken on an asserted destination from Amsterdam to Corunna—was condemned upon the ground that, although Corunna was a lawful port, yet, from its vicinity to the unlawful port of Ferrol, both must be regarded as substantially identical. Both were situated in the same bay, and the Court said: "If the supply is prohibited to be imported into the bay, it would, I conceive, be impossible to prevent it from going on immediately, and in the same conveyance, to Ferrol." But, in the case of the Jonge Margaretha, at page 189 of the same reports, the same Court held that a destination to Quimper could not be considered as such an identical destination with a voyage to Brest, as to call for a condemnation—the port of Quimper being [illegible] from Brest, being situated at the [illegible] of projecting headland [illegible], and not admitting of an immediate communication [illegible] by land carriage.

It is true, also, that in the case of the Marie, tried in the same year, 1805, reported in the 6th of Robinson, 201, Sir WILLIAM SCOTT said, in substance, that a blockade imposed by Great Britain upon the River Weser, must be its nature be held to affect the commerce of the neutral City of Bremen, situated upon it, because, as he argues, [illegible] blockade of the enemy's country upon the opposite side of that river.

These citations I cannot commit if I quote to them these opinions of a jurist of such eminence. But I deem it unnecessary, for the present, to dispose, as this continents again to be a matter of controversy, particularly if the act was done by a person who had interest of his own that might be expected to be the determinant of this injurious act. But though it does not frame an absolute presumption force of law, it surely stops short of that; for it certainly constitutes a presumption of a very strong character, which cannot which cannot be broken upon it, is easily traced to its source. There must be that overwhelming proof arising from the concurrence of every other circumstance in its favor that forces a conviction of its truth, in spite of the powerful impressions which such an act makes to the entire reprobation.

AMERICAN DECISIONS.

Turning to American decisions, I believe the consequences of a violation of paper in the seven either here or abroad been stated so favorably toward the accused as by Mr. Justice STORY, in the case of the "Pizarro," 2d Wheaton's Reports, page 227. Yet this case proceeds far enough, and more than far enough, to effectively condemn the transaction on board the Peterhoff. I quote:

"Concealment, or even spoliation of papers, is not of itself sufficient ground for condemnation in a Prize Court. It is, undoubtedly, a very suspicious circumstance, calculated to excite the vigilance and justify the suspicions of the captor. But it is a circumstance open to explanation, for it may have arisen from accident, necessity, or superior force; and if the party at the first instance fairly and frankly explained to the satisfaction of the Court, it deprives him of no right to which he is otherwise entitled. If, on the other hand, the spoliation be unexplained, or the explanation unsatisfactory, or there by a vehement presumption of bad faith, or gross prevarication, it is more the ground of a denial of further proof, and condemnation ensues from defects in the evidence which the party is not permitted to supply."

Chancellor KENT frames the spoliation of papers as an "aggravated and inflamed circumstance of suspicion." "That fact," he adds, "may exclude further proofs, and be sufficient to infer guilt." (1 Kent's Commentaries, marginal page 156.)

SURREPTITIOUS CONDUCT.

I confess that I was myself surprised in reading the testimony, to find the evidence so abundant of the surreptitious destruction of packages of papers by the master on board this steamer—himself the common agent and factor of all concerned in the enterprise. This testimony proceeds from not less than eight witnesses. They are of all stations, passengers, officers, seamen and firemen. I will call attention to the various responses to the twentieth standing interrogatory. This interrogatory distinctly inquires:

"Were papers, bills of lading, letters or other writings relating to the vessel, or cargo, on board the vessel at the time she took her departure from the last clearing port, before she was taken as prize? Were any of them burnt, torn, thrown overboard, destroyed or concealed, or attempted to be concealed, and when, and by whom, and who was then present?"

[The District-Attorney proceeded to read the answers of the several witnesses to the twentieth interrogatory, and also the affidavit and explanation of Capt. JARMAN, preliminary and in reply to the special interrogatories, subsequently administered to him. He then resumed as follows:]

PAPERS WANTED.

This testimony certainly establishes a spoliation of papers—a double spoliation, perpetrated with the manifest deliberation, with the utmost care, in pursuance of the most specific directions, with marked reluctance, only at the last moment, when a capture became inevitable, and with all that human testimony can afford of silence and concealment. What is the sole of spoliation? Hailed by the belligerent cruiser, the master is noted to go on board with his papers. These papers are to be frankly and fully exhibited. All of them are sacred. They constitute the only evidence of the true destination. The destruction of any one of them, although followed by an explanation, is to substitute the interested statement of a man for the written evidence of a document.

MASTER'S EXPLANATION.

Recurring to the words of Mr. Justice STORY in the case of The Pizarro, let us scrutinize the explanation of Capt. JARMAN. Does it not deepen "suspicions" already "justified" by the act itself? Does he pretend, can he, that the destruction arose from "accident, necessity, or superior force?" Did he, "in the first instance, fairly and frankly explain it?" Was he not, on the contrary, silent in relation to it, until, (in the language of Lord STOWELL in the Two Brothers,) he thought it prudent that it should be "added," when the "circumstance had been disclosed by another witness whose credit has been attacked?" Does not the explanation "appear weak and feeble?" Does not "the cause labor under heavy suspicions," independently of this branch of the proofs? Can any one read the Captain's labored account and resist a "vehement presumption of bad faith or gross prevarication?"

WHITE POWDER.

Is not the assertion, that a package thrown overboard was "white powder," inconsistent with the confessed anxiety exhibited in relation to it? Is not the story, in substance and in the manner of its relation, intrinsically weak and incredible? Was not the rejected pretence of "private letters," in the case of The Two Brothers, a sober truth compared with this reluctant relation of the careful preservation and destruction of "white powder?"

CAPTAIN AND SEAMEN IN CONFLICT.

The account is in conflict with the statements of the men. It is true that in ordinary cases the officers of a ship may establish a higher claim to credence, because of their superior intelligence; yet, in a prize case, the rule should be reversed. The seamen, unlike the officers, are usually not interested in the voyage, and from them may often be elicited the more legitimate testimony. The master is ordinarily a part owner, and no one, perhaps, of all engaged in the enterprise has so strong and varied temptations upon motives both of interest and supposed honor, to falsify, equivocate and conceal.

[The District-Attorney proceeded with a criticism of all the testimony in relation to the alleged spoliation, examining and comparing the statements of the Captain with themselves and with those of the other witnesses. He then continued as follows:]

SUSPICIOUS GUTTS.

In taking leave of this testimony, I will remark, only, that the effort of Capt. JARMAN and his owners, disclosed in his additional depositions, to have all persons on board divested, at the outset, with letters and papers, displays the same elaboration of care, which is so conspicuous in the preparation and outfit of vessels which sail with a just apprehension of the laws relating to piracy, to the Slave trade and to treaties of Internal [illegible]. Those who order the sea, in proximate the land, with lawful aims, are not so observant of the outward forms of prudence.

I have dwelt upon this long and that intended upon the general circumstances of suspicion surrounding this vessel, and upon that portion of the specific proofs which I could not but regard as not only the most important, if not all but as establishing, (with a sickening significance, the guilty character of this whole undertaking. With this observation, I have no purpose to detain the Court with any elaborate commentary upon other branches of the testimony. Even if such commentary were deemed by me at all necessary, I might well commit it to the counsel specially retained by the captors, who has requested to be heard, and who will have nothing unsaid which, in his experienced judgment, can justly and uphold a capture, made by the officers and men of the navy with so much boldness and fidelity.

OTHER PROOFS.

In addition to the facts and circumstances to which, either directly or incidentally, I have adverted in the course of my argument, the Court will not fail to consider the admissions made or related by the more humble of the witnesses, whose statements, although contradicted by those of their superiors in station, will be judged by the usual rule of credibility to which I have referred. The revelations of the witness TAGGART, are of a peculiarly fatal character.

MANIFEST AND MANIFESTO.

It will be observed that the manifest does not describe any of the articles which are contraband, and that in the column wherein such description should appear, we find [illegible] as "[illegible]." These, should remarks, in the opinion of the Court, that nearly all the cargo is consigned to order, "and by the bills of lading to be delivered to persons unknown." Such, the manifest, is in charge of the cargo. Erasures in the manifest, and the mutilated and deficient condition of the log-book, will not be overlooked.

LADING NOT ADAPTED FOR MEXICO.

It is distinctly alleged by the claimants that this ship was actually to reach the dock at Matamoras, but to lie at Brownsville, on the opposite side of the river. Both places are forty miles from the mouth, and the shallow bars of the river would render the voyage to the bar. They can shed some light of water vehicle were to take the cargo to the former place, or, that it was to be received on rebel lighters to a rebel port. Upon this issue, without again enumerating articles of the cargo, it is sufficient to call attention to their description. They are not adapted to consumption in Mexico, but are suited to the use of the enemy under the provisions of his revenue laws. Their suitableness to the habits, demands, and necessities of the enemy will not fail of recognition. The large horse shoes, for instance, would fit a stud of the "Black cavalry," but not the tiny foot of the Mexican mule or mustang.

THE PETERHOFF MAIL.

The withdrawal from the custody of the Court of the public mail of Great Britain, and its delivery through me, in the General of that country, to be by him forwarded to its professed destination, will be cited by the respective counsel for the captors and the claimants. Each will insist that the mail might have produced witnesses in favor of his clients. As it was thus disposed of at my instance, I shall argue nothing from its absence, and shall seek to infer nothing from the silence of the claimants when I applied for its release. They unquestionably, in that silence, acted in accordance with the wishes of their Government, as I, in my application, complied with the policy of my own. Both were, undoubtedly, moved by motives of a general character, with no reference to this investigation.

FURTHER EVIDENCE.

I shall not consume time by adding to what I have already said in the course of the trial, in relation to the paper purporting to be a copy of a letter of BERNEDO & WARE, which I presented in accordance with the course of the King's advocate, not disapproved by Lord STOWELL, in the case of the Romas, as reported in the 5th of Robinson, 351. Both the legal and the moral weight of this document will not be likely to escape a just determination at the hands of the Court.

RECAPITULATION.

With regard to that part of the cargo owned by BERNEDO, a resident of Texas, the principle is settled by the Supreme Court. It must be condemned as "enemy property." Such condemnation results from the residence of the owner in the enemy's country. The principle reaches the thing and not the person. It is immaterial whether he be at least, individually, a friend or an enemy. It is enough that his personal property, linked to the enemy's country by his residence, may be placed within the reach of taxation or appropriation to the uses of the hostile Power. If, however, I be right in my view of the entire case, this question is lost in the main and comprehensive issue in which the entire cargo with the ship is involved.

BELLIGERENT RIGHTS.

A vigorous administration of the public law both of blockade and of contraband of war, has been maintained by Great Britain, in aid of her own wars, as well those that were unjust as those that were just. It is the right of nations. The American Government will not surrender it—never, certainly, in a conflict for its existence. It is vital to an early and thorough suppression of the war of insurrection which has desolated so large a portion of its territory.

JUDICIAL POWER.

Rebellion, indeed, exhibits "swelling proportions," but cannot be speedily subdued and suppressed unless we can preserve the state while crushing overthrow. We march upon an extended front, [illegible] population, without any one great strategical or commercial key in the military or political power. It has no Gibraltar, no Sebastopol, no Paris, no London, and no New-York. They need, indeed, be certain. The national authority will be established, vindicated, enlarged. But that consummation will be near or far as the law of nations, shielded without fence, shall be by British tribunals, shall be sustained and executed by judicial tribunals.

CONFISCATION.

The speedy establishment of freedom and order upon this continent, and the consequent cessation of a bloody war, is the aspiration of patriotism here, and of humanity the world over. The achievement of a speedy as substantial and as general may be promoted or retarded by the decisions which cause like this shall reach as well the merchants and exporters of Europe, as to the power which maintains, and the people who sustain from the great rebellion.

G.

Awful and Instructive Scene.

[From the Rutland Herald.]

On the 23d inst. this town was visited by one of the most awful and destructive storms ever experienced, sweeping away and laying prostrate almost everything in its course. The gale mentioned early in the morning, northeast, and continued increasing in violence (the wind varying from N. E. to N. E. and S. W.) until 11 A. M., when it began to abate, and about 1 o'clock all danger from the wind and tide was over, and the afternoon was fair and mild, forming a striking contrast with the war of the elements which had raged but a few minutes before. The tide rose three and a half feet higher than it had ever been known before. At Providence it rose seven feet higher than ever before.

To attempt to particularize the suffering, in estimate the loss, is impossible. Two dwelling-houses and nine stores and workshops on the Long Wharf were carried away by the violence of the wind and tide, and those that withstood the gale are rendered almost untenable by the wreck, timber, &c., being driven against them. Several stores were carried away containing a considerable amount of goods, West India and other goods, which was nearly all lost. One of the houses swept away from the Long Wharf was occupied by Mr. ARNOW & ARNOW, and such was the ravaging and violence of the storm, that every attempt to save his family was in vain; they all perished, his wife, three children and a girl (his) lived with them.

The wharves on the Point, with most of the stores, stables, and other buildings, are gone, and many of the wharves in other parts of the town, with the stores on them, also sustained very considerable injury, and everything movable on the wharves was swept away. In some of the stores the water was four feet deep. The Long Wharf has sustained great damage and the stores on the head of the wharf are much shattered, and their contents (flour, sugar, corn, tobacco, &c.) damaged by the tide. The large, three-story store of DOR & ARNOW, contained nearly six feet from its foundation. A large three-story store on THOMAS CARPENTER'S Wharf, containing beans and flour, was taken from its foundation and floated into the harbor.

The town, after the gale, was a scene which defied description. Many of our streets were rendered impassable by the quantity of goods, timber, wood, spars, wrecks of houses, fences, trees, &c., lying in every direction. The steeples of the First and Second Congregational Churches were partly blown down, the roofs of the Episcopal Church and First Congregational were partly carried away, and other public edifices have sustained considerable injury. It does not venture to fix a calculation as to the damage, which, we fear, will be very great. Many poor families have lost their all, and were hardly to escape with their lives. The storm was one never before witnessed by our oldest inhabitants. The upsetting of hay-stacks, some of which had stood the fury of the elements for nearly a century, part of the town laundries, the wind blowing a hurricane, a prediction well nigh, some buildings falling to pieces like one big gamble against others with a force surpassed only by the tempests of an arctic clime, and amidst all these horrors were men, families struggling to escape from their houses, and persons stirring to save their property. After the storm the outside of the windows of the jail was found covered with a fine salt water, it seems, was conveyed from the ocean through the air, and the leaves of the trees from this cause, as it supposed, are scorched and crisped as with a scorching fire.

Two orphan boys were driven in the gale from a house in the town of Pittsford, and were carried down the Long Wharf on to the Point, where they were driven into the dock, and two dogs were seen on Long wharf. Much damage was done to the towns situated on the Narragansett Bay and along the shore, and a number of lives were lost in the different gales.

Tyranny.

—In a letter to the Chicago Times, Col. Grenfell, of the Fifty-second Illinois, [illegible] contradicts the statement that he denied the loyalty of the negro soldiers at Goodrich's. He believes they will prove perfectly loyal, as, so far, they have shown no disposition to do any thing else. He believes that they "fought like devils," performing wonders, either with the bayonet or their "teeth."

AFFAIRS IN THE WEST.

Political Topics—Railroads—State [illegible]—Agricultural Fairs—Secession—Democracy, &c.

Correspondence of The New-York Times.

CHICAGO, Ill., Sunday, Sept. 20, 1863.

Political matters are again exciting considerable attention. At our county elections this Fall, although there are nothing but county officers to fill, the probability is that party lines will be closely drawn, as between Unionists and Democrats—or rather Copperheads.

The War Democrats have issued a call for a State Convention, in [illegible] of last preceding in [illegible] etc. The call is signed by Gen. McCLERNAND, Hon. [illegible], Hon. [illegible], Hon. W. J. [illegible], and many others. Of course, the anti-secession journals denounce the movement, and raise the parrot-like cry of "Abolitionists!" against those who have [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] of Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS, here or elsewhere.

Mammoth Union meetings are being held in various parts of the State, and are doing much to bring out and demonstrate the loyal sentiment of our people. Gen. McCLERNAND is doing valiant service in the National cause, and will probably be our next Governor, as it is not the practice in this State to elect for a second term.

We feel much interest in the progress of the canvass in your State. It cannot be denied but that the Democrats have a strong ticket, as well as the Union men, and as the soldiers cannot vote, those of them at home will have to work all the harder for success.

As the soldiers do vote in Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota, we have no doubt in regard to those States. And even we consider victory certain in all of them on the home vote alone.

MORE RAILROADS.

Our Western Railroad system is not yet complete. In this State there is scarcely room for one more trunk line, but connecting links will be required. Of this kind is the Keokuk and Hannibal Road—extending from the Illinois to the Mississippi—connecting the St. Joseph and the Great Western Roads on nearly a direct line. It is the old Fife county road under a new charter. The grading was nearly all done by the old Company and most of the bridging, and 60,000 ties brought upon the ground. At this point their tracks gave out, and some thereafter their charters rights expired. Their interest, whatever it was, has been purchased by Gen. A. WARNER, Esq., and associates in Quincy, and some parties in Keokuk, who are now going ahead with the enterprise under a new charter and a new organization. The road is 45 miles in length—33 miles shorter than the present routes and distances, by an almost air line, two important roads, the Toledo and Mississippi, or Great Western, and the Hannibal and St. Joseph. Negotiations are now in progress for the lease, and the work will soon become a "fixed fact" in our railroad system.

The road from Green Bay to Lake Superior is progressing satisfactorily. It was hoped that it might be put in running order this Fall, but the work has been unexpectedly delayed.

The construction of railroads in Minnesota has received an impetus this season from the low state of water in the rivers. The Mississippi has not been so low for years, and it is only occasionally that the large steam boats have commenced running. It has even been so low that it was impossible to float down the large timber required for bridges. This has somewhat delayed operations on some lines, but, on the whole, the work has been pushed forward with unusual vigor.

There will be ere long a line of road along or near the east bank of the Mississippi, commencing at Warren, on the Illinois Central, and extending to La Crosse, a distance of 130 miles. This road is represented as important in the interests of Chicago. It is proposed eventually to extend this line to the East River of the North, by way of the Winona, St. Paul and Pacific Railroad. It also connects with the chartered Minnesota Railroad, to the Missouri, now in process of construction, and with a proposed line to Lake Superior.

FAIRS.

We are now in the midst of our County and State Agricultural Fairs in the West. The county fairs are being held quite as general as usual, but the attendance is not large, and the list of articles on exhibition does not equal that of former years. The horse-racing feature appears to be the most interesting, and in one instance I noticed that the amount of premiums offered in this department exceeded that of all other put together. This is becoming to be a great evil, and the annual festivals of our farmers are being turned into sporting events, gamblers and horse-jockeys to congregate to ply their demoralizing vocations. The proclamation of the editor and twenty-fifty of most of the newspapers, in that over the country for the establishing of the race course on every agricultural fair ground has thrown the foundation in fact.

The State Fair is to be held in Dixon's town. Quite extensive preparations are being made for the, and a good show in all departments is anticipated. One of its principal features is to be the trial of agricultural implements, now of so much importance in gathering the harvests of the West.

ECCLESIASTICAL.

The Diocesan Convention of the Episcopal Church was held in this city last week. There was a pretty full representation present of clerical and lay delegates. Bishop Whittingham presided. On the first day two resolutions to the canons were proposed, called out by the recent trial of Rev. Mr. HASKIN. Rev. JOHN WILLIAMSON, who was mixed up with that affair, proposed to amend canon 20 so as to permit none but clergymen from acting as advocates or proctors in ecclesiastical trials. Rev. Mr. CLEVELAND, of St. James' Church, Chicago, also wished to amend the canon relating to the trial of clergymen, other than Bishops. Rev. Dr. LEONARD, of Grace Church, in this city, preached the annual sermon before the Convention. In imitation of your New-York politicians, one of our churches sent a double set of delegates, so that the Convention had a contested seat question to dispose of. The address of the Bishop was presented, containing an elaborate review of the Diocese during the past year, and suggestions in relation to the various interests which the Convention had in charge. Drs. Chase, Cummings and Stone, and Rev. W. H. Roberts, of the clergy, and Hon. E. H. Tree, Hon. H. B. Servant, and Dr. Judd and George Greene, Esqs., of the laity, were appointed delegates to the National Convention. The number of communicants in the Diocese does not exceed 4,000.

For three or four days past an equinoctial storm was prevailed in this section. Rain, however, wind has been the principal feature. Not much of it has fallen in Central Illinois, in Northern Indiana, and through Michigan, the ground was covered with a mantle of white Saturday morning. Snow fell in the Lake Superior region nearly two weeks ago. All the indications, therefore, are that we are to have an early and severe Winter. The wild fowl have been making their way southward for some time past, which is regarded as a "sign" of coming cold weather.

We hear little about the effects of the great freshet. Each one has estimated his own loss, and the aggregate is very. Reliable estimates cannot be had, the damage is greatly less than it at first appeared, and some are materially affect the safety of engines, &c.

The Fall purchases of Chicago jobbing merchants, by merchants, whether they buy in New-York or elsewhere having to stock at least one-third as heavy as last year. The farmers are in funds, consequently goods go to demand everywhere. I was told by Johnson, Fisher, Wm. Dunham, Esq., and others, that the farmers in Illinois, a prime buyer, counting about as far advanced last a variety which the farmer has just brought in on his huge Pennsylvania wagon. The result was that we took our departure, and we [illegible] for his pay. This fact will show you that "way the money goes," and give some idea of the material prosperity of the farmers of the West.

Grain is coming in quite satisfactorily. Farmers are holding back somewhat on corn, but which is pouring forward in their quantities. On Saturday the receipts were 6,153 bbls. flour, 112,464 bushels wheat, [illegible] bushels corn, [illegible] bushels oats, 6,192 bushels rye, 20,097 bushels barley, and 16,127 bushels barley.

Shipments have been rather heavier than upon the past week, which have somewhat reduced the quantity in store, which is as follows: Flour, 18,000 bbls.; wheat, 406,281 bushels; corn, 626,021 bushels; oats, 324,021 bushels; rye, 20,021 bushels; barley, 22,311 bushels.

THE BREAK OF HOPEFAR'S.—We learn that the break at Hopefar's in Genesee, N. Y., on the night of Wednesday, [illegible] is probable [illegible] that night. A [illegible] gangway [illegible] East and West. This information we have from E. G. Gates, Esq., of Batavia. We saw the following memorandum in a letter dated Rochester, Friday: "Commenced looking on the level at 12 A. M. today."—Albany Argus 25th.

The Navigation of the Mississippi.

A LETTER FROM GEN. F. P. BLAIR.

Gen. F. P. BLAIR has written a long letter to President LINCOLN, urging the removal of the restrictions now laid upon commerce on the Mississippi. He says:

There is no such thing as putting down the rebellion by proclamations of trade or restrictive regulations as long as men can live on corn bread, beans, beef, mutton, poultry and vegetables, and can clothe themselves in cotton and wool, which they have an inexhaustible supply of material for about, &c. Equally futile [illegible] two years and a half of hostilities, have been our efforts [illegible] munitions of war. They either purchase these things for the rebel [illegible] through the blockade ports. They have [illegible] them from the Upper Mississippi, because, until recently, that region was, itself, in need of these articles. If, then, this region of country is already thus bountifully supplied with all articles of [illegible] commerce be to the Northwest, where the chief [illegible] is fixed? Before answering this question, it seems to me proper to say something of the present actual condition of affairs there, and dispel the misconception which I believe exists on that subject, and upon which is built the whole theory of the necessity of [illegible] the embargo of JEFF. DAVIS.

The entire region north of the Mississippi River, for a hundred miles on either bank, is free from the presence of any organized force of the rebels, and large portions of that territory are substantially occupied [illegible] every point on the river capable of being fortified—every point which commences by railroad with the interior, and the river itself, with its natural affluents, and the innumerable bayous which permeate the low or bottom lands like the veins in a man's body, are open, as our sunbeams, which constantly pierce them and make it next to impossible for any large organized force of rebels to approach on the Mississippi without danger of being cut off by a force thrown on their flanks or rear. It will not deny that small guerrilla bands have occasionally made their appearance on the river bank, but since the fall of Vicksburgh and Port Hudson, the course of this species of warfare has been so much diminished, and the dangers to the guerrillas so much increased, that I think it may be safely asserted that they have not fired half a dozen hostile shots since then on any of the banks of the Mississippi.

Instead, therefore, of these regions being a country infesting with enemies, whom we must not supply, it is, in fact, clear of all hostile foes, and a vast number of the people are anxious to renew their allegiance and refuse their old relations to the Government upon such terms as the Government shall dictate. This at least is my candid opinion, formed from personal observation. Is it desirable to foster this disposition on the part of the people, and which is now just coming to enforce this, and that we treat them, although not in arms, as enemies, who are not to be supplied, or shall we allow them again to share the blessings of the old Government which, when over, they renounced or were forced to renounce? Which course is best calculated to conciliate them, and which is most worthy of the rulers of a great nation?

The Government policy of leaving the abandoned plantations open to loyal men, for the purpose of supplying our factories with the raw material and giving employment and support to the freed slaves, requires that the trade should be opened in order to give those lessons the means of feeding and clothing the negroes. If this system is to take root and extend itself to such a degree as to accomplish the object sought, it cannot be the intention of the Government to feed all of the negroes so displaced out of the Commissary Department, nor can it be the intention of the Government to feed and entertain an aristocracy in the interest of which it must feel the greatest interest, while the expense and the delays attending the present system of trade in its very nature are fruitful of corruption as to taint and destroy every interest with which it comes in contact. It is almost impossible to conceive of any beneficial or beneficial trade which can spring up under a system which requires it to be evaded in order that trade may be profitable. It is the old system which enriches the smuggler and destroys the honest dealer.

This system contains another vice, in this, that it assumes to proceed upon the principle that military necessity requires it to be put in force, and yet its execution is committed to the hands of civil officers, under the orders of a different and distinct department of the Government.

A consideration which I think should not be overlooked, will be found in the moral influences which would be exerted at home and abroad, by a proclamation to open the navigation of the Mississippi. This great fact could not fail to arrest attention in foreign countries in which public opinion has been swaying to and fro on the question of recognition and intervention. It would not only arrest attention, but such a striking proof of the progress of our arms might even arrest designs which, it is not improbable, have been harbored in some quarters against us. It has been said that the capture of Richmond, the rebel capital, by our arms would exert a vast moral influence in our favor in the old world. It seems to me that with reflecting men—the men to whom the destinies of the Governments of Europe are confided—a proclamation striking off the shackles placed by DAVIS, and his accomplices, on the navigation and commerce of the great Mississippi, would bearer a far more important fruit. It would signalize the resumption of the national authority over a vast empire, and would leave even the sympathizers of the rebellion without hope for a cause thus shorn of its strength.

The West has suffered much from this abolition, and has done its whole duty in putting it down. The railroads which have borne its produce to the Eastern marts have been clutched by the embargo laid upon the Mississippi River. It is full time that this should cease, and yet it is a matter of fact that even since the fall of Vicksburgh and Port Hudson the steamboats which carried our produce to New-Orleans have been reduced to a small trade in the Northwest carrying of guest, at the very moment when this staple was permitted to be shipped by sea on our Atlantic ports, to be carried thence to the West, for consumption, by railroad.

Why this discrimination? It could not be for fear that the boats and cargoes would fall into the hands of the enemy. The danger, on the high seas, from such pirates as the Alabama is far greater than any which has ever attended on the Mississippi. Is it the fact of the rebel strongholds. Was it the fear, or something worse, of a Treasury agent sitting in judgment on questions of military policy? I have addressed you as the representative of a great commercial city, sorely tried by the vicissitudes of this war, but whose temporary interests have never swerved her from the support of the Government, and whose faith in the President's determination to do what is just and right will always remain unshaken.

Very respectfully, F. P. BLAIR, Jr.

WASHINGTON CITY, Sept. 4, 1863.

NOTE.—Since writing this letter, it may not be improper to remark that the guerrillas on the Mississippi have become more troublesome than at any former period since the fall of Vicksburgh. If trade and commerce on the river, is it not reasonable to suppose that the people residing along its banks would have felt an interest in putting a stop to the operations of these marauding bands. It is well known that on the river above Memphis the people have, at a great expense, to employ companies to suppress guerrillas, and where not strong enough to suppress them, they have warned the boats of danger, and this has been done from the motives of interest which these people have in the commerce of the river.

FROM THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

Bermuda papers contain the following interesting items from late West Indies and Demerara journals:

BERMUDA.

Much anxiety is being felt in the Colony in consequence of many of the immigrants lately imported leaving there for the neighboring colony of Carolina.

The Natural History Society has had an exhibition of a collection of specimens on the Natural History of the Colony. It was opened on the 1st of August. The collection was most extensive and interesting. On the first day of meeting the medals and honorable mentions awarded by the jurors at the late International Exhibition, London, were presented to the successful exhibitors by the Hon. William Walker, chairman of the committee.

BARBADOS.

The severe drouth which has prevailed, and which has caused serious forebodings for the safety of the young crops, had happily terminated in copious showers of rain, which had not only thoroughly moistened the soil but supplied the ponds with water.

ANTIGUA.

This island was suffering from a long and severe drouth which had previously afflicted the colony, and it was feared that unless speedily relieved by refreshing showers the consequences would be most sad for the inhabitants. On Friday, the 21st ult., was, by the Governor's proclamation, observed as a general day of humiliation and prayer. Business was everywhere suspended, and all the various churches and chapels were open for special religious services in supplication of the Divine mercy.

JAMAICA.

It is rumored that the Duke of Buccleuch was to be appointed Governor of the Island. There was a strong feeling expressed in favor of the Governor by £2,000 or £3,000 per annum, in order to insure the appointment of a gentleman of ability and influence.

A meeting had been held in Montego Bay at which the conduct of ministers of religion and community in the late administrator for the conduct of Hon. Justice Cameron in his judicial capacity. It was resolved, "That this meeting views with alarm the administration of justice as illustrated at the late Jail Circuit Court for the Parish of St. James, held before Mr. Justice Cameron, when criminals found guilty of infamous offences against the people, were in no instance sentenced to imprisonment."

THE WAR IN ARKANSAS.

Interesting Particulars of the Capture of Little Rock.

British Skirmishing Before the Occupation.

Four Guns and Large Quantities of Ammunition Captured.

A letter to the Chicago Journal, dated Little Rock, Ark., Sept. 10, gives interesting particulars of the occupation of that place. The Arkansas River was crossed upon a pontoon bridge eight miles below Little Rock: Gen. DAVIDSON's column effected the passage after some opposition by the enemy, who destroyed two steamers to prevent their falling into the hands of our forces, and the column was formed by giving Col. RITZER's brigade, with SENZOT's and LOVEJOY's mountain howitzers, the advance; Col. MERRILL's brigade, with HADLEY's battery, the centre; and Col. RITZER's brigade, with CARRSON's battery, the rear.

At the moment of Gen. DAVIDSON's crossing the river, Gen. SCHOFIELD, whose columns had been massed near at hand in readiness, started with infantry, Col. CLAY took a cavalry brigade and very powerful batteries, and assaulted the rebel works upon the north bank of the river, where if was believed that PRICE, in largely superior numbers, awaited an attack. No enemy was encountered, PRICE having evacuated the works and crossed his rebel forces to the south side of the stream, with the purpose of overwhelming DAVIDSON.

The former mouth of Bayou Fouche, five miles below Little Rock, was reached by Gen. DAVIDSON's advance brigade about 1 o'clock. There is a mud bar about a thousand yards in width and two miles long between the bank and channel of the river. The crossing of the bayou is very fine, but the road bears off and follows up the left bank about a mile, crossing upon a levee, by which the bayou is turned from its bed into a swamp.

Leaving the road at this point, the head of the column pushed up close under the bluff bank, with dense forests upon the immediate left. There had been skirmishing at the crossing of the bayou, and the rebels had fallen back before our line of skirmishers in the woods. Skirmishers advanced through the timber until they met with a heavy fire in flank from the enemy upon the opposite side of the bayou, when they halted. The column supporting the skirmishers in the woods were still advancing, but pushed on slowly, until almost half a mile in advance of the main body. Companies B and H, of the Tenth Illinois, were in advance, SENZOT's and LOVEJOY's howitzers following fifty yards behind, the remaining ten companies of the Tenth following. When almost half a mile ahead, they were suddenly greeted by heavy volleys of musketry from the woods upon their left, and some drift wood directly in front. Lieut.-Col. STONE, in command of the Tenth Illinois, was stunned by a ball upon the first volley, and fell to the ground. His regiment retreating the fire on the flank, was much disordered. Saddle after saddle was emptied, and the advance companies came tumbling back over the batteries, followed by the rebels, who swarmed from their hiding places, and, with a savage cry, made a grand rush for the guns.

Completely disordered by the suddenness of the attack, and what they conceived to be the loss of the Colonel, the regiment fell back with great precipitancy until checked by Gen. DAVIDSON, who dashed among them and rallied them once more into line, while under the enemy's fire. The howitzers were soon at work and succeeded in firing about a dozen rounds of shell and spherical case into the midst of the assailants, as they rushed in masse across the open space before them. Abandoned by its supports, the whole battery was in imminent danger of capture, and an effort was made by the cannoneers to withdraw. The horses had suffered severely, and only two guns could be drawn off in the usual manner. Four more of them were run off by hand.

The section of LOVEJOY's, nearest the woods, was captured by the enemy, but only after every man belonging to them had been killed or wounded. The Lieutenant himself was wounded while endeavoring to keep the enemy from one of his guns with his sabre, while two of his men, both of whom were subsequently mortally wounded, were endeavoring to draw it off. He was left on the field, but managed to crawl far enough away for an ambulance to reach him. Only one of the caissons belonging to these two guns was captured.

The Tenth Illinois, taking to the cover of a point of timber, swept before them with a merciless shower of bullets, which prevented the rebels from following up and capturing all the guns, which were being withdrawn by hand, and drove them away from the other caissons. The remaining six howitzers were brought into position upon the sandbar, HADLEY's heavy guns behind them, both supported by MERRILL's brigade, and a vigorous fire poured into the woods where rebels were lying.

The whole of GLOVER's brigade was dismounted, and formed in the line under cover of the bank. Two mounted and two dismounted squadrons of the First Iowa were detailed to support SENZOT's howitzers, which were to be held as army reserve on the right. MERRILL's brigade, with the remainder of LOVEJOY's howitzers and HADLEY's guns, were withdrawn, and sent up on the left of the bayou, and soon found the enemy in heavy force in front. The brigade dismounted, and deployed as skirmishers, and batteries brought forward into position. Half an hour's close fighting resulted in MERRILL gaining ground so far as the advance of GLOVER's brigade, which, keeping pace by a right wheel, had advanced its left through the woods until the whole brigade was brought into line parallel with that of MERRILL, completing the line to the river.

Our reserve, as well as the right of our line, were now exposed to an enfilading fire from the opposite side of the river, and dense clouds of dust gave proof of the presence of troops in that quarter. It scarcely seemed probable that SENZOT could pass the ford so far and nothing heard from him. Amid this most painful uncertainty the whole line was ordered to advance, and was soon greeted with an angry volley of musketry, rolling from one extreme to the other, and mingling with the sound of artillery as the action became general.

Fortune seemed to favor us, for, as soon as our line was developed, nearly all of SENZOT's batteries, having taken a concealed position upon the opposite side of the river, wheeled into action. The contest was close and resistance of the enemy stubborn. So desperately did they dispute every foot of ground over which we advanced that at 5 o'clock we were still two miles distant from Little Rock.

Information had been received from Gen. STEELE that there was no force in his front, and consequently PRICE's whole force was upon our side of the river. Evidently the whole of it and he had brought into action, and preparation must be immediately made to meet it. In case PRICE should bring all against us, the best possible preliminary means of this kind must be the occupancy of the city. Time was everything, and Gen. DAVIDSON now brought up RITZER's brigade, which, up to this time, had not been engaged. The First Missouri, by a gallant sabre charge, drove the enemy from a cornfield, and dismounting, deployed as skirmishers to relieve Minnesota's and GLOVER's brigades, which were setting down and exhausted by a four miles fight. The Third Iowa and Thirteenth Illinois were then ordered to charge with drawn swords, and enter the town at all hazards. Lieut.-Col. CALDWELL, Gen. DAVIDSON's Chief of Staff, accompanied the head of the column, which was at once placed in rapid motion, galloping up the road, regardless of a close fire of sharpshooters poured upon them from every covert, and drove the gunners from the 64-pounder which had been annoying STEELE, before they could fire a train prepared to blow up the magazine; and, with shouts which made the streets resound again, dashed into the city, driving out a superior force of rebel cavalry, who did not care to feel the onset of drawn sabres which were going through the dense clouds of dust in which our advance was enveloped.

Information was received after entering the city that Gen. CANBY, from the Fort Smith country, with 5,500 cavalry and mounted infantry and two full batteries, was hurrying forward to participate in the battle, and that for some time previous to the charge of RITZER's brigade they had been obliquoing to the right, where their nearest batteries were posted, leaving a space upon the left which CANBY was to occupy. It was probably the intention, as soon as CANBY came up, to mass a heavy force upon our left, and pour in resistless numbers upon our rear. The timely charge frustrated the plan. CANBY's Adjutant-General, proceeding in front in advance some distance, was entering one side of the town as RITZER's brigade dashed in on the other. He was hotly pursued by some of our cavalry, but succeeded in escaping, and giving CANBY notice of our presence, the column was wheeled about and marched back toward Fort Smith, and compelled to make a great detour in order to join PRICE's retreating forces.

The charge of RITZER's brigade determined the issue of the day. Instead of turning Gen. DAVIDSON's flank, PRICE found his own turned, and, withdrawing his forces through the woods, he gained the Arkadelphia road, upon which his trains had been moved for several hours, and took up the line of retreat southward.

Pursuit was impossible, as the men have been in saddle since early daylight, and neither man nor beast had anything to eat or drink. The horses are literally tired out and require rest. A force will be organized this evening, under command of Col. MERRILL, and will take the road in the morning.

Gen. STEELE reached the river opposite the city in advance of our column, and, by judicious use of his batteries, materially contributed to its success, as well as saved it from loss.

Our loss is comparatively light. Sixty killed and seventy wounded probably covers it.

The rebel loss must have been more serious than ours, but most of their dead and all their wounded were removed as they fell back, and are said to be in houses near the field.

Maj. CEASER, commanding DOBBIN's regiment, was struck by a fragment of shell and died in a couple of days from the wound.

PRICE commenced evacuating his works as soon as the telegraph informed him of our crossing. He was fearful of a demonstration upon his depot, six miles west of the city, where he had 400 wagons parked, and had sent about one-half his forces there. DAVIDSON fought and whipped the remainder.

LATER:

A strong cavalry force, under command of Col. MERRILL, left at daylight this morning, in pursuit of the enemy, retreating along the Arkadelphia road. CARRSON's and HADLEY's batteries and SENZOT's and LOVEJOY's howitzers promptly accompanied the expedition. Heavy cannonading had been heard during the night, and it is reported that MERRILL will be able to render a good account of himself.

Gen. STEELE's advance was not heard that he was able to save two or three bridges fired by PRICE in his night. They will be repaired during the day. The General and his Staff are already in the city, having crossed in skiffs.

As an acknowledgment of his gallant services during the day, Gen. STEELE, as soon as he entered Little Rock, placed Gen. DAVIDSON in command of all the troops in the city, and vicinity, and intrusted to him the municipal and police regulations of the place.

Soon after our forces entered last evening, C. P. BOUTOUN, Mayor of the city, formally surrendered it. We captured two 64-pounders, one 24, and three 12-pounders. The arsenal was uninjured, and the magazines contain about a ton of powder, and several thousand pounds of fixed ammunition.

Preparations had been making to blow up magazines and fire the arsenal, but the entry of our troops was so sudden that all such designs were frustrated. The Penitentiary is unburned, but the convicts were removed at such short notice as to leave their supper standing untasted upon the tables, and the clothing and bedding of the prisoners and officers in their respective apartments. Seven gunboats were decayed—the P. W. Bugg, Gen. Lesley, John Rose, San Francisco, Leon, Arkansas and Thalequah. Four others were not destroyed—the Alma, Stonewall and Gen. Green, and a ferry-boat.

The rebels burned the gunboat Pontchartrain, formerly the steamer Lizzie Simmonds. She was being plated with railroad iron, and not yet completed.

THE SEIZURE OF THE RAMS.

HOW THE TORIES TAKE IT.

From the London Herald, Sept. 12.

We have good reason to believe that the Government has committed itself to an error as we in our affair of the steam rams built at Birkenhead. We are informed that Earl RUSSELL, on Wednesday, dispatched, by written mission, a positive order to Messrs. Laird to prevent these vessels leaving their yards without an ample explanation of their destination, and a satisfactory reference to the owner or owners for whom they are constructed. The Foreign Office has thus distinctly pledged itself to the Federal policy which has been imposed upon it. Without regard to the letter and simple provisions of the existing laws of the country, without regard to the general sense of fairness and equity, which animates the English nation in its rendering and translation of the Foreign Enlistment act, Lord PALMERSTON, or, rather Earl RUSSELL, leading his more aged Premier, has determined to exercise a power that could only be delegated by the assembled Legislature of the land. It is asserted that this step of prohibition has been resolved upon and carried out solely because, at the present juncture, it was thought to be precisely to the Confederates." Apprehensive that these steam-rams may, at once be used to reinforce the Confederate navy, the Cabinet has acted directly as a partisan, and has agreed to follow the fashion of the American Bench, and proceed upon "presumption" and "suspicion." It is now affirmed, moreover, that the French Ambassador has been appealed to as to the possibility or responsibility of a French subject having ordered vessels of this stamp of an English ship-builder. There is declared to have come a proper official reply from His Excellency that no French subject has any legal right to possess, or purchase vessels of war, either for himself or on behalf of others. Earl RUSSELL, it is said, argues to himself that these vessels could only be vessels for the warlike purposes of a State or an Indian tribe. His Lordship holds that Messrs. LAIRD are bound to decline and sustain an unimpeachable testimony such declaration—the Government for whom the steam rams have been built. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs is also of opinion that if it is pleaded that these vessels are for an individual owner, native or foreign, that individual could only be a privateer or a pirate. And it is on these grounds that the Government has made up its mind. At any rate the English Government is now firmly resolved to try the question in a court of law, and, if amerced for damages, to make an appeal for support to the House of Commons.

There can be no doubt that the member for Birkenhead, who is a man of action, of high spirit and undaunted temper, will take up the challenge. His business, in his eyes, is not to be at the mercy of the Foreign Office. So marked an obedience to the pressure from the Federal Government will have to be thoroughly explained and accounted for, and the business of the Foreign Office will have to yield up and publish some very peculiar correspondence before the whole secret of this extraordinary step is to be thoroughly understood by the public.

THE FRENCH IN MEXICO.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON ANXIOUS.

Correspondence of the London Times.

PARIS, Wednesday, Sept. 9.

Although the losses, mishaps and sufferings endured by the French expeditionary corps during the first part of the campaign in Mexico may be considered in great measure effaced and compensated by subsequent triumphs and final success, it is by no means certain that the ruler of France does not still occasionally ask himself the oft-repeated question: "Que diable allais-je faire dans cette galère?"

Although the great unpopularity that at one time attached to that intervention may now be during away by reason of the circumstances, there can be no doubt the French Government by no means see the end of its difficulties, and perhaps its anxieties with respect to the Mexican affair were never more serious than at the present moment. It denies, and I believe with truth, that it has received protest or remonstrance from the United States Government with respect to its interference in Mexico, and to its attempt to establish there an Empire with a European Prince at its head. But, although nothing of this kind has yet officially passed, there is reason for expecting that such a protest could be issued to date, especially if the tide of success continues to set in favor of the Federals. The reasonable conviction is entertained in high quarters here, and is shared by the Mexicans themselves, that there will be little security for the territory, or duration of the new Empire, unless a broad barrier can be interposed between it and the encroaching spirit of the American Federation. That barrier would be found in the establishment of the Southern Confederacy, which, being already a vast territory, far greater than it requires for its population, would readily enough recognize and guarantee the new Mexican State, especially if some inducement were offered to it by France. Had the French been able, at last year it was sanguinely anticipated would be the case, to bring matters in Mexico to their present point several months ago, when the Confederate arms were in the ascendant, and the Confederate cause looked bright and hopeful, the difficulty now existing would have been much diminished, and it is probable that the Emperor NAPOLEON, who, it is well known, now considers that it was a mistake to recognize the blockade of the Southern ports, would then have recognized the Southern Confederacy. But matters have changed since then, and there is no concealing the fact that the prospects of the Confederates have got much worse, and that a mere recognition, unaccompanied by the opening of the ports or some other material success, would be of much use to them. The question, then, for the French Government lies between giving them such assistance as would necessarily involve it in a war with the Northern Union, or allowing them to be overcome and so compromising the future of the Mexican State, which it is now in the act of establishing, and which it may, indeed, almost be said to have created out of social and political chaos. The objections to any step leading to a war with the United States are great and evident. Among the chief of them may be set down the difficulty and enormous expense of carrying on a conflict at such a distance, the unpopularity in France of such a war, the cry that would be got up by the opposition against French arms being applied to the maintenance of slavery. This is the immediate evil; the other, although somewhat more remote and less positive, is evidently looked upon here as one most urgent to guard against. The Federal Government may as yet have taken no official step in the matter, but numerous private letters from America express the strong dissatisfaction there felt with the proceedings of France in Mexico, and the conviction that the Government of Washington reckons on not allowing the arrangements that have been made to remain long without very serious notice. The position the French Government finds itself in is difficult and delicate, and you may depend that the Mexican affair is at this moment the principal subject of its thoughts and anxieties.

The papers say that Count de MONTHOLON, formerly Consul-General at New-York, will shortly proceed to Mexico as French Minister resident. The Mexican Minister in Paris will be, it is expected, Señor HIDALGO, who has been Secretary to Mexican Legations in Madrid and Paris, and who is one of the members of the deputation charged to offer the Mexican Crown to the Archduke MAXIMILIAN.

The religious element has been most important in bringing about the intervention of France, and it is well known that the same high female influence which was strained to the very utmost last year on behalf of the Papacy was also probably exerted in favor of the Almonte party in Mexico.

WHY THE AMERICANS OBJECT.

The Opinione Nationale of the 7th inst., contains the following article of peculiar interest at this moment, when the kindred measures of overthrow of Republican Governments in Mexico, and the hinted recognition of the rebels, are exciting such lively discussion on both sides of the Atlantic:

"The journal La France," it says, "cannot manage to comprehend why our presence in the United States is disagreeable to the United States. The reason, however, is simple enough. It is generally preferable to have small States for neighbors rather than too powerful ones. We, certainly, have no desire to counter Belgium or Holland. However, if it should please England to establish herself in these two countries, and especially, to proclaim the Republic there, the Imperial Government would, perhaps, be of disagreeable temperament enough to feel very little satisfaction, and to find itself its neighbourly relations and gained very little by this change.

We have equal doubts as to whether the United States will be very favorably impressed by the assurance and assiduity with which the supporters of the expedition to Mexico ask for the reconstruction of the Independence of the South; they might take it into their heads that, if the French flag were not floating in Mexico, the idea of recognizing the South would never have been conceived by a French journalist.

Finally, even admitting that the United States are wrong in feeling dissatisfied, it still appears incontestable that they are so, and about as decisively that instead of inquiring what pressing and imperative interest calls upon us to seek new enemies away in America, when in an enterprise that touches our honor, our interests as well as our most lively sympathies, we have not yet found in Europe a single great Power disposed to act with us.

We see the quantity of money absent, certain embarrassments for the future, a subject of deep satisfaction to England. We still admit some demonstration of the advantages which France (we do not mean, the paper of that name) is about to derive from all this." AD. GUEROULT.

THE AMERICAN WAR.

From the London Times Sept. 10.

After all that can be said, we fear it cannot be denied that the North have gained unquestionable and serious advantages, and that the South, considered at least as a belligerent Power, is in a critical and dangerous condition. Its seaports are being taken, its armies are being driven back, and its means of communication with abroad more and more curtailed. However it may be accounted for, the fall of gold being at 230 must mean ruinously high prices, and ruinously high prices must mean more or less exhaustion. The consumption of men may be nearly equal on both sides, but it must be vastly greater in proportion in a population of ten millions than in one of twenty. After all, the question is not who fights best, but who can fight the longest and the strongest.

THE SEIZURE OF THE RAMS.

HOW THE TORIES TAKE IT.

From the London Herald, Sept. 12.

We have good reason to believe that the Government has committed itself to an error as we in our affair of the steam rams built at Birkenhead. We are informed that Earl RUSSELL, on Wednesday, dispatched, by written mission, a positive order to Messrs. Laird to prevent these vessels leaving their yards without an ample explanation of their destination, and a satisfactory reference to the owner or owners for whom they are constructed. The Foreign Office has thus distinctly pledged itself to the Federal policy which has been imposed upon it. Without regard to the letter and simple provisions of the existing laws of the country, without regard to the general sense of fairness and equity, which animates the English nation in its rendering and translation of the Foreign Enlistment act, Lord PALMERSTON, or, rather Earl RUSSELL, leading his more aged Premier, has determined to exercise a power that could only be delegated by the assembled Legislature of the land. It is asserted that this step of prohibition has been resolved upon and carried out solely because, at the present juncture, it was thought to be precisely to the Confederates.

THE FRENCH IN MEXICO.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON ANXIOUS.

Correspondence of the London Times.

PARIS, Wednesday, Sept. 9.

Although the losses, mishaps and sufferings endured by the French expeditionary corps during the first part of the campaign in Mexico may be considered in great measure effaced and compensated by subsequent triumphs and final success, it is by no means certain that the ruler of France does not still occasionally ask himself the oft-repeated question: "Que diable allais-je faire dans cette galère?"

Although the great unpopularity that at one time attached to that intervention may now be during away by reason of the circumstances, there can be no doubt the French Government by no means see the end of its difficulties, and perhaps its anxieties with respect to the Mexican affair were never more serious than at the present moment. It denies, and I believe with truth, that it has received protest or remonstrance from the United States Government with respect to its interference in Mexico, and to its attempt to establish there an Empire with a European Prince at its head. But, although nothing of this kind has yet officially passed, there is reason for expecting that such a protest could be issued to date, especially if the tide of success continues to set in favor of the Federals. The reasonable conviction is entertained in high quarters here, and is shared by the Mexicans themselves, that there will be little security for the territory, or duration of the new Empire, unless a broad barrier can be interposed between it and the encroaching spirit of the American Federation. That barrier would be found in the establishment of the Southern Confederacy, which, being already a vast territory, far greater than it requires for its population, would readily enough recognize and guarantee the new Mexican State, especially if some inducement were offered to it by France. Had the French been able, as last year it was sanguinely anticipated would be the case, to bring matters in Mexico to their present point several months ago, when the Confederate arms were in the ascendant, and the Confederate cause looked bright and hopeful, the difficulty now existing would have been much diminished, and it is probable that the Emperor NAPOLEON, who, it is well known, now considers that it was a mistake to recognize the blockade of the Southern ports, would then have recognized the Southern Confederacy. But matters have changed since then, and there is no concealing the fact that the prospects of the Confederates have got much worse, and that a mere recognition, unaccompanied by the opening of the ports or some other material success, would be of much use to them. The question, then, for the French Government lies between giving them such assistance as would necessarily involve it in a war with the Northern Union, or allowing them to be overcome and so compromising the future of the Mexican State, which it is now in the act of establishing, and which it may, indeed, almost be said to have created out of social and political chaos. The objections to any step leading to a war with the United States are great and evident. Among the chief of them may be set down the difficulty and enormous expense of carrying on a conflict at such a distance, the unpopularity in France of such a war, the cry that would be got up by the opposition against French arms being applied to the maintenance of slavery. This is the immediate evil; the other, although somewhat more remote and less positive, is evidently looked upon here as one most urgent to guard against. The Federal Government may as yet have taken no official step in the matter, but numerous private letters from America express the strong dissatisfaction there felt with the proceedings of France in Mexico, and the conviction that the Government of Washington reckons on not allowing the arrangements that have been made to remain long without very serious notice. The position the French Government finds itself in is difficult and delicate, and you may depend that the Mexican affair is at this moment the principal subject of its thoughts and anxieties.

The papers say that Count de MONTHOLON, formerly Consul-General at New-York, will shortly proceed to Mexico as French Minister resident. The Mexican Minister in Paris will be, it is expected, Señor HIDALGO, who has been Secretary to Mexican Legations in Madrid and Paris, and who is one of the members of the deputation charged to offer the Mexican Crown to the Archduke MAXIMILIAN.

The religious element has been most important in bringing about the intervention of France, and it is well known that the same high female influence which was strained to the very utmost last year on behalf of the Papacy was also probably exerted in favor of the Almonte party in Mexico.

WHY THE AMERICANS OBJECT.

The Opinione Nationale of the 7th inst., contains the following article of peculiar interest at this moment, when the kindred measures of overthrow of Republican Governments in Mexico, and the hinted recognition of the rebels, are exciting such lively discussion on both sides of the Atlantic:

"The journal La France," it says, "cannot manage to comprehend why our presence in the United States is disagreeable to the United States. The reason, however, is simple enough. It is generally preferable to have small States for neighbors rather than too powerful ones. We, certainly, have no desire to counter Belgium or Holland. However, if it should please England to establish herself in these two countries, and especially, to proclaim the Republic there, the Imperial Government would, perhaps, be of disagreeable temperament enough to feel very little satisfaction, and to find itself its neighbourly relations and gained very little by this change.

We have equal doubts as to whether the United States will be very favorably impressed by the assurance and assiduity with which the supporters of the expedition to Mexico ask for the reconstruction of the Independence of the South; they might take it into their heads that, if the French flag were not floating in Mexico, the idea of recognizing the South would never have been conceived by a French journalist.

Finally, even admitting that the United States are wrong in feeling dissatisfied, it still appears incontestable that they are so, and about as decisively that instead of inquiring what pressing and imperative interest calls upon us to seek new enemies away in America, when in an enterprise that touches our honor, our interests as well as our most lively sympathies, we have not yet found in Europe a single great Power disposed to act with us.

We see the quantity of money absent, certain embarrassments for the future, a subject of deep satisfaction to England. We still admit some demonstration of the advantages which France (we do not mean, the paper of that name) is about to derive from all this." AD. GUEROULT.

THE AMERICAN WAR.

From the London Times Sept. 10.

After all that can be said, we fear it cannot be denied that the North have gained unquestionable and serious advantages, and that the South, considered at least as a belligerent Power, is in a critical and dangerous condition. Its seaports are being taken, its armies are being driven back, and its means of communication with abroad more and more curtailed. However it may be accounted for, the fall of gold being at 230 must mean ruinously high prices, and ruinously high prices must mean more or less exhaustion. The consumption of men may be nearly equal on both sides, but it must be vastly greater in proportion in a population of ten millions than in one of twenty. After all, the question is not who fights best, but who can fight the longest and the strongest.

How English Opinion is Enlightened.

THE CORRESPONDENT OF THE LONDON TIMES ON JUDGE BETTS.

To the Editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser:

The correspondent of the London Times, writing from New-York on the subject of the Peterhoff case, says:

"Should be well, however, for Earl RUSSELL and the British public to know that Judge BETTS, in the first place, is not a functionary of the rank of such men as Lord BROUGHAM or Dr. LUSHINGTON, but an "attorney" elected for a term by universal suffrage, and paid by a salary that would have no attractions for a third-rate, much less for a leading professional advocate; and in the second place, that no reporters regularly attend his court, and that no official record whatever is kept of the proceedings or of the judgments delivered. The Judge keeps his own notes, and such professional gentlemen as are employed in the several cases doubtless preserve a private record of the proceedings. But beyond this there is nothing to show the exact terms or phraseology of any judgment that may be delivered, or the evidence on which it may be founded. As these decisions become precedents, it is obvious that it is highly important to the commercial public of Great Britain and other countries that there should be some official record of them. But there is none. Thus, to a considerable extent, the fancy or caprice of Judge BETTS, whose professional status is not superior to that of a police magistrate in London, may decide upon the most delicate questions of international law, without other remedy open to the aggrieved owners of ships and cargoes than a costly and protracted appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States."

Every statement in this paragraph is untrue.

1. The Judge is not "elected by universal suffrage," but is appointed by the President, of the United States, by the advice and consent of the Senate.

2. He does not hold office "for a term," but for life, and is not subject to removal except on conviction by the Senate on an impeachment by the House of Representatives. His tenure is more independent than that of any judge in England. The English Superior Judges may be removed by the King on an address voted by a mere majority in Parliament, and their inferior judges hold at the pleasure of the Crown.

3. Judge BETTS was not an "Attorney" as the English use that term, but a member of the Bar of the Supreme Court and a Counsellor of high standing.

4. It is not true that "no official record whatever is kept of the proceedings or judgments delivered." Judge BETTS' court is a Court of Record. A careful and extended official record is kept of all the proceedings and of the judgment. The correspondent of the Times can obtain an authenticated copy of all the proceedings and of the judgment in the Peterhoff case, made from the records. Not only are all the original papers kept on file, including the judgment or decree, but there is a bound volume in which all these are written out.

5. It is not true that beyond the private notes of the judge and of counsel "there is nothing to show the exact terms or phraseology of any judgment that may be delivered." On the contrary, the decree in a Prize Cause, in the District Court, is always written out and signed by the judge, and gives the conclusions of facts and law to which the Court has arrived, so that, all tribunals before which the decree may be cited, may know the grounds on which the decision rests.

6. It is not true that beyond the private notes of the Judge and of counsel "there is nothing to show the evidence on which the decree may be founded." All the evidence is in writing, and is not only strictly preserved on the files of the Court, but copied out at length in the record. Unlike a Court of common law, the Prize Court enters the evidence on its record.

7. "But there is none" (no official record.) On the contrary, there is a file of originals and a copy in the record of every act of the Court, of all the evidence and of the decree, with the grounds on which it is founded.

8. It is not true that Judge BETTS' professional status is not superior to that of a Police magistrate in London." On the contrary, beside the independence of his tenure of office, he has, being ex officio Judge of the Circuit as well as of the District Court, jurisdiction in all causes which can be tried in Federal Courts. He can try for treason, piracy and murder. Sitting in the Circuit Court, he, with one other Judge, has final jurisdiction in all capital cases, where the Court is not equally divided. There is no appeal or Writ of Error beyond that Court. He can try alone all criminal cases in the Federal jurisdiction on land. He has jurisdiction over all civil, land and maritime causes, public or private, of whatever magnitude, and all Revenue suits, and all suits for forfeitures, confiscations and penalties. In the Circuit Court he has jurisdiction over all equity suits that are triable in Federal Courts, and suits under the patent and copyright laws, whatever their magnitude. In one word, he has jurisdiction over all cases at common law, equity or admiralty, civil or criminal, which are triable in Federal Courts, with power to issue prerogative writs of mandamus and quo warranto. In some of these cases his decision is final, and in a large portion of them, including all capital cases, he is one of two Judges whose united decision is final.

9. It is not true that "he is not a functionary of the rank of such men as Lord STOWELL and Dr. LUSHINGTON." If the writer means official rank. The two Courts to which the Judge of Prizes is a judge, jurisdiction far wider and embracing a far greater variety of causes, touching life, liberty and property, and touching constitutional and international law, than has ever been conceded in England to any Court, except the House of Lords.

10. Against the decision of Judge BETTS there is "no other remedy....than a costly and protracted appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States." What would the writer have said if there had been no appeal to the Supreme Court? "Costly and protracted." This from an "Englishman!" The appeal is not half so costly as the appeal to the Privy Council in England. It is not "protracted." To prevent costs and delays, the last Congress abolished the appeal to the Circuit Court, and permitted a single appeal at once to the Court of final resort; and the Supreme Court gives precedence to Prize Causes. The rule in England as to appeals is the same. A prize cause is heard first by one judge in the court of original jurisdiction, and "against his decision there is no redress but by appeal to the Privy Council."

11. It is not true that there are no reports of the decisions of Judge BETTS. The decisions in all cases in the Circuit Court, and in all cases of magnitude and public interest in the District Court, are written out by the Judge himself, and published from his manuscript in the daily journals, and the law magazines, sometimes in separate pamphlets and sometimes in volumes. There are three volumes of the reports of the decisions of Judge BETTS alone, in the District Court in Admiralty.

How could more false statements be crowded into the same space? When we consider that the writer resides in New-York, and is addressing the whole civilized world on the most delicate subjects, about which there is the utmost sensitiveness, with the danger of irritating parties into a war, does charity require us to call these mistakes? Are they not wilful ignorance or wilful falsehood?

The Ironsides at Charleston.

ADMIRAL DAHLGREN'S DISPATCH.

FLAG-STEAMER PHILADELPHIA,
OFF MORRIS ISLAND, Sept. 15, 1863.

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I inclose herewith the reports concerning the part taken by the Ironsides in some of the recent actions, and concur with Capt. ROWAN in the estimate he takes of the services of the ship and ship's company, to which I consider himself as most conspicuous.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. A. DAHLGREN, Rear-Admiral,
Commanding S. A. B. Squadron.

CAPT. ROWAN'S DISPATCH.

UNITED STATES STEAMER NEW-IRONSIDES, OFF FORT WAGNER, MORRIS ISLAND, S. C., Sept. 10, 1863.

SIR: The Weehawken, being hard aground on the pass between Sumter and Cumming's Point, the batteries from Fort Moultrie opened upon her. In obedience to orders, I moved this ship up (casting off the Memphis, which was at the time supplying me with shell,) Buoy No. 27 interposing my ship and completely covering the Weehawken from the fire of the enemy. The moment we anchored and commenced swinging head on to Fort Moultrie, the enemy opened fire upon us, which was terrific.

Fortunately, however, we succeeded in getting her port broadside to bear by the time they had gotten our range. We opened slowly at first to get range on Moultrie, when I directed a very spirited and concentrated fire on that fort, which compelled it to slacken. We also directed our attention to the forts between Moultrie and Beauregard. One of the heavy guns on these was dismounted, and the fire of the others sensibly slackened. I then directed one gun to continue rapid fire on each of these forts and concentrated the remaining fire upon Moultrie.

The fire of all the forts slackened down to an occasional gun, when I directed a slow fire to be kept up. The moment the enemy discovered this, he jumped from behind his sand-bags and opened rapidly. Upon our rapid fire was attempted his silence.

It affords me great pleasure to bear testimony to the fine bearing and gallantry of the detachment officers: Lieut. H. B. Robeson, Acting Master Geo. W. Domett, Acting Master John H. Smithers, Acting Ensign Charles W. Howard, and Ensign Benjamin H. Porter.

The Captains of guns and their spirited crews have my warmest thanks for the splendid manner in which they handled their guns. Paymaster RUSSELL has my thanks for great zeal and ability in command of the powder and shell division. I particularly recommend to your notice and that of the Department the services of Lieut.-Commander BRIENAN, in whose zeal and ability as Executive officer I am so much indebted for his untiring efforts to make the ship efficient in every department, and for his fine judgment and bearing in carrying out my orders as commander of the gun deck during the fourteen times that this ship has been under the fire of the enemy's batteries.

The pilot, Mr. ENOS DOXEY, merits at the hands of the navy the high praise for the skillful manner in which he has handled this ship, particularly in working her up to Moultrie in the night, without lights, in the hottest fire.

I inclose herewith the report of Mr. BAKER, carpenter, detailing the injuries.

I am happy to say I have but few casualties. The Surgeon's report of them is inclosed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. G. ROWAN, Captain Commanding.

To Rear-Admiral JOHN A. DAHLGREN,
Commanding S. A. B. Squadron.

HIS VIEWS OF THE PRESIDENT'S HABEAS CORPUS PROCLAMATION.

WINDSOR, C. W., Sept. 17, 1863.

To the President of the Democratic Mass Meeting at Carthage, Ohio:

Since writing to the mass Convention at Dayton, to-day, the monstrous proclamation of the President has appeared, suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and thus declaring martial law, throughout the United States, in every one, and every part of every one of them, and in all their territories. It comes without previous warning. It is introductory, it is said, to the success of the Federal armies and the reverses of the Confederates are greater than at any period since the beginning of the war; at a time when the lines of the former are more extended and of the latter more contracted and further removed from the original frontier than ever before, and at a time when, according to the Secretary of State, the rebellion is at last almost crushed out. It appears in the midst of no riot, tumult or other popular commotion anywhere in the States (always true to the Union, and no preparation for any and when even the odious "conscription" is being executed quietly, and without resistance wherever announced. It is to continue "during the rebellion"—the President being the sole judge and arbiter of how long the rebellion shall be deemed to last. At such a time, and under such circumstances, it can have but one object—the pending elections this Fall, but especially the Presidential canvass of 1864. It is, indeed, the full development of that of which I have so often warned the people of Ohio and of the United States—the great conspiracy against constitutional liberty and free popular government—the establishment of a military and proclaimed despotism" in your midst. Oh, that the warning voice, feeble though it was, which two years ago, at the beginning of this great struggle, in accents earnest as ever issued from human lips, cried aloud to the people that, one by one, their liberties were about to perish, and that anarchy first and a strong government afterwards—no more State lines, no more State governments, but a consolidated monarchy, or vast centralized military despotism, must all follow in the history of the future, as in the history of the past they had centuries before been written. But that voice found no echo then, save in the columns and corridors of the Capitol. To-day it is lifted up again. And hereafter let no man tell you—least of all, the sentinels upon your watchtowers—that there is no danger, no ground for alarm or apprehension. To-day your President is in terms, for two years and more he has been in fact, a MILITARY DICTATOR. The most incredulous may see at last that the issue is, indeed, whether there shall any longer be Constitution and law in the United States, other than the will, unknown or expressed, of the President, whether freedom of person, of the Press, of speech, free political assemblages and a free ballot, shall any more exist among us, and whether the people shall hereafter, as heretofore, choose the Legislatures and Chief Executives of the State and Federal Governments. Shall there be free State elections any longer, or another Presidential election of any sort? Shall popular government, or a despotism, limited by law and uncontrolled by judicial courts, henceforth prevail in the United States? This now, men of Ohio, more than ever, is the issue before you. The revolutionary purpose of the Administration to perpetuate, by intimidation or force, its power in the States and in the general Government, stands now fully revealed. Next after this declaration of martial law, will follow the armed seizure and occupation of your State by Federal troops, to intimidate or overpower you at the polls. To that this monstrous purpose will not and cannot be executed, except that the people cringe or cower before the threat or the attempted execution. The time, therefore, has now arrived for the renewed, solemn, inexorable declaration and pledge, by the people to each other, through the Press and in public assemblages, that they mean to maintain their liberties at every hazard, and to have and to hold free elections, peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must. By the Constitution of Ohio no soldier or marine of the United States can gain a residence or become a citizen and elector of the State by being stationed within her limits. By the law of England, and by a prudent statute of Pennsylvania, all troops are required to be removed to a prescribed distance—not less than one mile—from the place of holding an election; and this, too, is the spirit at least of our own laws. Every qualified elector of Ohio has the right freely, and without molestation of any kind, to vote the ticket of his choice, and if Federal or State troops be present to molest or intimidate—no matter under what pretext—it is the right of the citizens and the duty of the civil officers and of the militia to disperse or arrest the offenders, and to use whatever force may be necessary for that purpose. I counsel you, one and all, to stand by the Union, maintain the Constitution, support the Government, and obey the laws; but in the name, and by the memory of your fathers, and as you would secure the blessings of liberty to yourselves and your children, I invoke you to defend the right of election and the ballot-box, by all the means which the exigencies of the times may demand. The hour of your trial has at last come. Be firm and be modest, and God grant that the spirit of the patriots, and freemen of other ages and countries, of the

NEWS OF THE DAY.

THE REBELLION.

From Washington we have a report of cheering news from the Army of the Cumberland, but the details are withheld. The rebels make no sign of attacking Gen. ROSECRANS at present.

A Cincinnati dispatch affirms that Gen. BURNSIDE has reached the point where he was expected to prevent the flank movement of the enemy.

The expedition to Texas has not been abandoned in consequence of the late disaster at Sabine Pass. We learn from New-Orleans that the movement will now be made overland, and the large force to be engaged in the undertaking were going forward as rapidly as the transportation facilities would admit by way of Brashear City and Berwick Bay. The occupation of Texas may be regarded as a fixed fact.

Our West Gulf Blockading Squadron did a first-rate day's work on the 12th inst. From the New-Orleans Era of Sept. 17 we learn that the blockade-runners Fox, Alabama and Montgomery were all captured on the same day by our cruisers, in the vicinity of Ship Island. These prizes are all valuable. The Montgomery was taken by the gunboat De Soto, and the Tennessee was conspicuous in the capture of the others.

The Savannah News, of the 11th, says that the prisoners who were captured in the assault on Fort Sumter, have been taken to the city and lodged in jail. So they will hardly be placed on the parapet of the fort.

On Wednesday last a train arrived from Frankfort at Louisville, Ky., containing 1,162 rebel prisoners, a part of those captured at Cumberland Gap by Gen. BURNSIDE at the time of the surrender of that place. The prisoners were a very common-looking set of fellows, and were dressed in every costume conceivable. We understand that the remainder, nearly 1,300 in number, would arrive yesterday and be sent forward to Camp Douglas. The prisoners arrived represented four regiments from Virginia, Georgia, North Carolina and Tennessee.

Army correspondents give further particulars of the cavalry skirmish at Madison Court-house, Va. Between seventy and eighty Confederates were killed and wounded, and about one hundred and seventy-five taken prisoners. A large amount of property was destroyed, and a train of army wagons, filled with stores, captured and brought within the Federal lines.

FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Anglia, from Galway on the 15th inst., arrived at Boston yesterday. Her news is two days later, but we are without our usual telegraphic summary, in consequence of the disarrangement of the line at St. Johns, N. F., where the Associated Press dispatches were left. The Courrier du Havre states that the rebel steamer Alabama would probably visit Cherbourg at an early day. The seizure of the pirate Florida, at Brest, had been opposed by the maritime Prefect at that port, with the object of preserving the inviolability of the harbor as a military port. The Russian Government had imposed enormous taxes upon the ancient provinces of Poland. No commercial news has been received.

GENERAL NEWS.

The steamship North Star, from Aspinwall Sept. 17, with $277,651 in treasure on board, arrived yesterday. The feud which has been existing for some time at Panama between the clergy and the Government, because of the refusal of the former to take the oath of allegiance to the new Constitution, has been settled, the priests having complied with what was demanded of them, and all the churches, which were closed while the difficulty existed, are now opened for religious services. A good deal of interest is taken in Panama in the cultivation of cotton, and under the fostering care of the Government it is hoped that before long the Isthmus cotton will be quoted in the markets of the United States and Europe.

Yesterday afternoon WM. N. BROWN, one of the proprietors of the "Pewter Mug," No. 162 Nassau-street, was shot and killed in front of the saloon, by JAMES H. NIXON, a crippled soldier. There are different statements as to the circumstances attending the affair, and which are true will be ascertained by the Coroner's Jury which meets this morning. Deceased was well known, and had long been a prominent Democrat and member of the Tammany Society.

The officers of the Russian squadron now at anchor in our harbor, yesterday paid a visit to Mayor OPDYKE in his office at the City Hall. The party consisted of the Admiral in command and the Captains of the various vessels, who were accompanied and introduced by the Baron VON OSTEN-SACKEN, the Russian Consul-General at this port.

A very serious railroad accident occurred on Friday evening between Lawton and Matteawan, Mich., causing the instant death of five persons, and the maiming of twenty-two others. Some drunken rowdies cut the bell-rope and drew out a connecting-link between the cars, thus dividing the train. Being on a down-grade, the engineer did not discover what had been done, and when he stopped at Lawton, the rear portion of the train came at violent speed down the track, and a collision ensued with the above-mentioned deplorable result.

Col. E. G. BECKWITH is discharging the duties of Provost-Marshal of New-Orleans during the temporary absence of Gen. BOWEN.

The St. Louis Republican of Thursday states that Gen. SMITH's division, of Gen. GRANT's army, left Memphis several days ago, to reinforce Gen. ROSECRANS, and that other troops are doubtless en route. A dispatch from Cairo to the Chicago Tribune, dated Sept. 23, states that the Government had taken up eighty steamers for the transportation of troops.

An improved demand prevailed on Saturday for the principal kinds of Breadstuffs; Flour, Wheat and Corn were dearer; Oats cheaper. Provisions were attracting more attention, and sellers had any existing advantage. Cotton was in moderate demand at irregular prices. Sugars were more sought after, as were also Hay, Tallow, Tobacco and Whisky. Fish, Fruit, Hops, Oils, Coffee, Seeds and Spices were in request. Wool was active and buoyant. The freight engagements were rather more extensive.

It is estimated that the wheat crop in the South, this year, will amount to nearly 60,000,000 bushels. In 1860 over 31,000,000 bushels were harvested. This great increase is accounted for by the fact that unusual attention has been paid, since the beginning of the war, to the cultivation of the cereals. Cotton and tobacco have been planted only to a limited extent.

The Duty of the Moment.

The country has never been in more need of clear heads and steady hands than now. The Summer successes of the National cause exalted our hearts and hopes beyond expression. It was thought the Union had well nigh thrown off that black nightmare of rebellion that for two years had been seated on its breast, and that it was about to rise refreshed, and, like the sun leaping up the horizon, "rejoicing as a giant to run his race."

There was abundant reason for elation and joy. Our conquests had been grand and decisive. The rebellion was pushed back to within the limits of five States, and seemed about to die of suffocation. It would have perished speedily without relief—it will perish speedily without relief—which has not yet come.

A desperate effort has been made to break the coil which was wound round it. The effort is not yet successful, but it has come so near as to show that success is not impossible. This is the case as we have to deal with it, and we need patience and equanimity to order our actions wisely. It will not do to run about as fools at a house afire. We shall confuse ourselves, and accomplish nothing. Pitching mirrors out of five-story windows, or hewing rosewood furniture to pieces in order to remove it, is not wisdom at a conflagration.

Let us be equally careful how we go to the rescue of ROSECRANS. It may not be safe to send MEADE headlong against Richmond, lest he meet "a lion in the way," and we have "Washington to save" as well as Chattanooga. It will not do to regather GRANT's whole army and hurl it pell-mell eastward, lest the Mississippi River be occupied again and bordered with rebel obstructions.

Something in each Department is no doubt necessary, by way of what doctors call "counter-irritation," but that something should be ordered advisedly, and after careful diagnosis of the situation. The old proverb is a wise one which says "festina lente"—make haste slowly. The Government should be prompt, but careful—the people should be resolved, but patient. A rash attempt to repair a backset may end in even greater reverses. We can lose much in Northern Georgia and regain it in one campaign. But it would try the popular heart to be called on to endure a category of disasters.

Social Effect of the War.

The time must come when we shall see the end of this rebellion, and the consequent disbanding of the greater portion of our armies now in the field, and it is not inopportune to look at the return of our soldiers, and the effect that they are destined to have on our general social condition. We had somewhat of an opportunity to test this upon the return of the two years' regiments, but not fully, from the fact that they were but a small portion of those in service; and, again, a large percentage reenlisted within a few weeks. At the close of this war the State of New-York alone will have over one hundred thousand men returning to their homes, once more to become citizens and an immense element for good or for evil. There is no disputing the fact that some of these will find it hard to settle into their old avocations, and will be a restless, non-laboring portion of the people, always ready for filibustering, and hard to repress on that point. But it is of the main body, who will become distributed through the people, of whom we speak. They have been taken from every grade of life, and from every trade, pursuit and profession, and upon each respective grade and profession they will bring to bear the results of the military education they have received. This education, extending over a period of nearly three years, is one based upon the very first principles of society, discipline, both mental and physical, and a recognition at once both of the sovereignty of the individual and the authority of the ruler. The man who has been taken from the plow and the workshop, without ever having felt the power that was invisibly over him, and always working to restrain his passions and to protect him, will come back with a knowledge of that unseen law or discipline which makes him either a good soldier or a good citizen. The one who was a ne'er-do-well in the past, has been taught the value of personal struggles, and the worth of personal pride, and while forced to a life of temperance, and social consideration for his fellows, has had, if he was capable of reform, one worked upon him, that will last a life time. The man who went away, leaving behind him money, or the love or pursuit of it, or leaving behind some petty, trifling, or dishonorable attachment to which he had devoted his life, will return, having forgotten the goddess of his idolatry, and become awakened to the real business of life. He who enlisted from absolute friendlessness at home, generated possibly by his own faults, has, by commencing a new life, made new associations, and placed himself in a regenerated phase with the old ones; has, while he has shaken off the past, learned from his experience that a man cannot live without ministering to the comfort or enjoyment of those with whom he comes in contact. The mechanic or laborer has been instructed in the value of time and punctuality, and will come back to the workshops and the fields, not only believing in the justice that should be rendered him, but in that which he should render. If their officers have done their duty, they will know that "cleanliness is next to godliness," and will understand the simple laws that govern health. They will have learned that not only life but health can be supported without indulging every appetite suggested. They will know the meaning of manly, honorable pride, and indulge it, and that pride which will teach them to speak of their past, will keep them careful in the present and in the future. The soldier who would "shoulder his crutch, and show how fields were won," will be careful what he does to blacken that reputation for which he served in peril, and of which he is so proud to speak. This education will be carried into their homes, and be transmitted to their children. The soldier who has for so long a time been debarred the society of women, will be trebly appreciative, and whether he is beginning his matrimonial venture, or continuing it, will more thoroughly understand the importance of woman to every hour of his life, and the weight of his enhanced toils in her absence. The discipline he has been taught in the army he will insensibly introduce in his family, and his children will find a benefit from his education, which, like bread cast upon the waters, will be returned to him after many days. Last upon the list is the fact that the returned soldier, in most cases, is always in the midst of those who were once his military comrades. He has enlisted from a locality, and returns to it, and among those comrades he has a character to uphold that cannot be sacrificed lightly. He stands in the same relation that a man does to his family. They have passed through sunshine and storm together, and a fellowship has been created that must last as long as life, and have an influence in the cultivation of those social qualities that bind them together, and break down the barriers continually built by men whose entire soul is absorbed in the one idea of gain.

These are to be the results of the return among us of such of our citizens as have donned the blue, and gone forth to the patriotic fight. Those croakers who are fearful of an ending of the struggle because it will release a small nation of men from arms, need have no fear. The army element will come back into our midst better men and better citizens, and may yet be able to teach us something we ought to know.

What Bragg May Do.

Some of our Western exchanges took a gloomy view of the results that might follow a "bad defeat" of ROSECRANS near Chattanooga. They anticipated, in that case, a flank movement by BRAGG that would bring him immediately northward again through Tennessee into Kentucky. And ROSECRANS, if beaten in battle, would not be able to follow and head him off, as Gen. BUELL did so successfully on the former occasion.

A hypothesis giving the enemy all the advantages that could possibly be his in the most favorable eventualities of battle, and saving nothing to the Union arms that courage or fortune might secure, leads very naturally to conclusions adverse to patriotism and the right. But why surrender in advance the whole case to the enemy? BRAGG has not beaten ROSECRANS so badly that he can push by him without fear. If he has beaten him at all, it is at the cost of equal exhaustion. The Union army was driven back, but it is not accustomed to long retreats. Though it "fell back" on Chattanooga after two days' fighting, it had spirit and mobility enough, two days later, to advance again to the enemy's front, and effect a much-desired reconnoissance of his position. The puissant BRAGG did not punish the impertinence—nor try.

Again, even if BRAGG felt able to pass the army of Gen. ROSECRANS, and push for the Ohio River, he would not find the road clear and the gates open, as he did before. Gen. BURNSIDE occupies the line of march he would have to pursue, and even if compelled to retreat, this General could so embarrass BRAGG's advance as to deprive it of the essential quality of celerity. Cumberland Gap, in other hands, might at this time invite a damaging invasion of Kentucky; but now, just as a sudden rush into that State would do harm, this gateway is closed, and the key is in loyal hands.

On the whole, it does not appear that BRAGG can reenact the campaign he performed last year, fruitless as that remarkable episode was. If ROSECRANS is too much crippled to pursue, BRAGG is unquestionably too much exhausted to march, as he would have to march before entering Kentucky. The audacious enterprise could hardly be put on foot before overwhelming masses could be thrown in the way, and the enemy met nearer to Chattanooga than to Chaplin Hills.

The danger in Tennessee is not that BRAGG will flank ROSECRANS as he did BUELL, and march North, but that he will send cavalry raids to the rear and break the communications of ROSECRANS with Nashville. Such a movement would compel ROSECRANS to weaken his front to protect his rear, and the great extent of line to be guarded, though threatened by only a small portion of the foe, might so weaken his garrison at Chattanooga as to render its hold of that place doubtful. Let the Government see to it that communications are kept open between ROSECRANS and Nashville, and BRAGG will remain in Georgia.

BORING AT THE WHITE HOUSE.—Missouri is determined not to let President LINCOLN mismanage the great trust reposed by the people of the United States in his hands. After repeated warnings to that eminent functionary as to the path of duty he should pursue—after "line upon line and precept upon precept"—"here a little and there a little"—that State has at last invoked a mass meeting—or a camp meeting—to be held at Washington, for a prayerful consideration of his case. The St. Louis Democrat of Thursday says: "From seventy to eighty delegates, representing the Union men of nearly that number of counties in the State * * * left this city yesterday afternoon for Washington, by the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad. Some of the delegates from the northern part of the State have gone by way of Chicago. The President will hear the voice of ALL THE LOYALTY OF MISSOURI!" So that doubtless a round hundred of the most eloquent and loquacious of Western political preachers will soon have our amiable but erring President by the ear. What will be his fate under the infliction we dare not think. Heaven forefend and deliver him!

After the mission of Herr TAUSSIG to Washington, we did hope that this style of addressing the Government would come to an end. The appliance of personal pressure, illustrated in the irruption of five-score dusty and wayworn travelers from remote States of the Union, carpet bags in hand, in the presence of the President, is an insult to his person and his office. Is this the way of impressing truth into the mind—as a wedge is driven by a maul into a out of rail timber?

Suppose other States should imitate Missouri in her style of approaching the President—the poor man would be driven in a week to the mad-house or sent a "demned moist body" into his grave.

When TAUSSIG was in Washington boring the President, the latter told the envoy that he thought the two factions in Missouri richly deserved "having their heads knocked together." The country concurred, and still concurs in that apt suggestion of the President. And now that he has "seventy or eighty"—or a hundred rather—of the one side in Washington, it is hoped he will keep them cooling their shins in the hotels until he can get an equal number of the craziest (but certainly more respectful and discreet) men of the other side on hand—and then formally proceed to "knock their heads together." The country will applaud this settlement of their feuds.

The Peterhoff.

The capture of this steamer, by Admiral WILKES, produced in England a degree of harsh commentary, which is likely to be softened, if not reversed, when the grounds of her recent condemnation by a United States Court shall have become known and understood. We have received a stenographic report of the trial, which is now being printed for transmission to Europe. It appears that for the purpose of avoiding delay in the decision, Judge BETTS deferred for the present the preparation of a written opinion. But we find, in the report above mentioned, the argument of Mr. E. DELAFIELD SMITH, the United States District-Attorney, setting forth, in a clear and compressed style, the facts and principles upon which the Government relied in the prosecution of the case.

This address of the District-Attorney will be found in another part of to-day's TIMES. We make room for it, because so much of published opinion upon the subject of this capture has emanated from foreign and interested sources.

The artifices whereby British tradesmen have sought to convey, through Nassau, Cardenas and Matamoras, contraband of war to the States in insurrection against the National authority, are thoroughly exposed in this argument. Judicial decisions of the Courts of Great Britain are brought to bear, with point and force. And while the able advocate treats with marked deference the rights of legitimate neutral trade, he proceeds to demonstrate, that by a destruction of papers and by other evidences of guilt, this particular vessel unquestionably forfeited, under the accepted law of nations, all fair claim to the character of a lawful trader.

The argument will be found interesting alike to the professional, the mercantile, and the popular reader. A perusal of it will furnish a clear idea of the American side of this judicial and diplomatic question. From recent indications, as well as from the merits of the controversy, we are satisfied that the propriety of the condemnation will not be seriously questioned either at home or abroad.

The Schleswig-Holstein Question Again.

The great grievance of "Vaderlanders" seems to be not so much the impracticability of creating a united Germany—not so much the difficulty of getting rid of the thirty or forty despots who divide and depress their country—as the fact that the little Danish Duchy of Schleswig is not yet annexed to the Teutonic Confederation. SHAKESPEARE says that ambition "grows by what it feeds on," and the gradually increasing aggressions of the Federal Diet on the prerogatives of Denmark are a verification of the adage. At first the aim of the Diet was limited to redressing the wrongs of Holstein and Lauenburg. They, it was averred, were German Duchies, and, as such, the Bund claimed the right of casting its ægis over them. The exercise of this right led to war and interminable diplomacy, until at length the Danish King sought to cut the northern gordian knot by issuing his proclamation of last March, which guarantees autonomy and legislative independence to his German possessions. His Majesty, of course, congratulated himself on having solved this intricate problem, and satisfied the Confederation. The Confederation, however, was not so easily satisfied as FERONIC had concluded. It could not deny, indeed, that the King had dealt most liberally with the Teutonic Duchies—had conceded to them, in fact, a measure of freedom such as no other portion of Germany enjoyed; but then what did all this signify since Schleswig was severed from Holstein, and was still part and parcel of Denmark? The Diet, therefore, became very indignant, and quite forgetting that Schleswig is not Teutonic land, it passed a resolution menacing the Danish Government with a "Federal execution" in Holstein, if the royal proclamation of the 30th of March was not promptly withdrawn, and the sister Duchies reunited. The passage of this resolution has called forth a declaration from the King of Denmark, in which he refuses to cancel the obnoxious proclamation, or to sever Schleswig from the monarchy, and intimates that he will regard the enforcement of the threatened "execution" as the initiation of war on the part of Germany.

That the Bund will have the temerity to carry out their menace is not improbable; but if it is the duty of the Federal Executive to redress the wrongs of Germans wheresoever they inhabit, would it not be well to begin the philanthropic work at home, instead of in Denmark? The rights of the Prussian people have been grossly outraged by their King and Government; their Diet has been dissolved, their Press muzzled, their Constitution desecrated, yet we don't hear that the oppression of these Prussian Teutons has excited any indignation in the breast of the Confederation. All its sympathy, all its chivalry are reserved forsooth for the Teutons of Schleswig; the vials of its wrath are alone poured out on the head of the Danish monarch. Such one-sided philanthropy looks spurious, and foreigners cannot be convinced that the motives which incite the Bund to this incessant intermeddling in the affairs of Denmark are not in reality very different from those avowed. It is possible, however, that the Bund may hold German sovereigns more privileged in the matter of tyranny than non-German, and the powerful more privileged than the weak. But though the little Cimbrian Kingdom contains only two millions of inhabitants, and Germany her forty millions, the Confederation, in the event of war, will encounter no contemptible enemy. If the military force of the Danes is insignificant, their navy is formidable, and will enable them to inflict serious wounds on the commerce and prosperity of their Titanic adversary by blockading the ports of her maritime cities.

Nor must the Bund imagine that Denmark will be left to wage the unequal conflict single-handed. As long as the question at issue related solely to Federal territory, other nations did not like to interfere, but if aggression be perpetrated because the Danish King will not accede to the requisition of the Diet touching a province with which it has no right to meddle, the case will be different. Then FREDERIC will find many and powerful States ready to rush to his rescue. A French army may cross the Rhine and compel Prussia to fight for her existence.; a British fleet might appear in the Baltic to cooperate with the Danes in the blockade of German ports, and the interruption of German commerce; while Sweden, that has ere this actually entered into an alliance offensive and defensive with the Government of Copenhagen, will send an auxiliary force into Jutland to aid Denmark in repelling invasion from her continental possessions. Before the Federal Executive, therefore, determines on commencing hostilities against the Danish King, it had better consider well whether it may not by doing so involve Germany in a war which will prove dangerous to her independence, and destructive of her prosperity.

The New Policy of the Prussian King.

The reform project of the Austrian Kaiser has been at once a source of pleasure and of alarm to VON BISMARK and his master. Of alarm, lest it should result in reducing Prussia to a secondary rank in the Confederation; of pleasure, as affording them so excellent an opportunity for appealing to the Nation, and attempting to turn its attention from domestic grievances to external dangers.

Since the conference at Gastein both Monarch and Minister have been concocting all sorts of schemes for baffling Austria, and extricating themselves from the difficulties of their position. Their fears and their antipathies have driven them to acts the most inconsistent. While they have lowered the dignity of Prussia by stooping to intrigue for an alliance with the great enemy of Germany; while they have proclaimed their dread and hatred of representative assemblies by dissolving the popular Chamber, they have dared to address themselves to the pride and the patriotism of the masses in behalf of the prerogatives of their country. In the preamble to the decree of dissolution WILLIAM and his mentor thus labor to arouse the Anti-Austrian passions of the people and to render them oblivious of royal and ministerial delinquencies:

"Tendencies have recently manifested themselves within the limits of the Federal constitution, the evident aim of which is to reduce Prussia from that position as a sovereign Power in Germany and Europe, which is her well-earned inheritance, and which the Prussian people have at all times been determined not to relinquish. Under these circumstances it will be incumbent on them to give expression, on the occasion of the approaching elections, to the fact that no difference of political opinion is so deeply rooted in Prussia as to endanger the unity of the nation, and the immovable fidelity with which it is attached to the Royal House when confronting efforts to diminish the independence and dignity of Prussia."

The idea of course which this appeal is designed to convey to the popular mind, is that the kingdom being in imminent danger, and the King and VON BISMARK its most devoted champions, it behooves all loyal and patriotic Prussians to blot out of remembrance all the misdeeds of the Government, and to rally in this trying emergency to the unconditional support of the Monarch and his Minister. But though ingeniously concocted and seasonably made, said attempt to play on the feelings of the people will hardly prove successful. Those devoted champions of the independence and dignity of Prussia, while requiring such evidence of disinterestedness and patriotism from the masses, seem not at all disposed to give the slightest indication that they possess a particle of either themselves. Their manifesto contains no expression of regret for the past—no promise of concession in the future. On the contrary, it is very plainly intimated therein that both King and Minister are determined to persist in their unconstitutional course, and that the new Diet will share the same fate as the last, if it be not more courtly. They urge the people to postpone the vindication of their rights, and the redress of their wrongs, and to combine with the Government in curbing the ambition of Austria, but they would rather see Austria triumphant and Prussia reduced to the condition of a second-rate Power in Germany and Europe, than condescend to acknowledge their own delinquencies, and make reparation for the outrages of which they have been guilty. Under these circumstances, it is not by any means probable that the nation will suffer itself to be seduced by the rhetoric of the Premier, and consent to put off the settlement of the questions at issue between the country and the crown, in order to sustain WILLIAM in his struggle with the Kaiser. It may be safely predicted, then, that the coming elections will be still more unfavorable to the Cabinet than the preceding ones, and that the new Chamber will prove still more unmanageable than the old. In the presence of the insulted and enraged deputies, the King will, in fact, find himself in an awkward dilemma. Without their support he cannot checkmate his rival. Without dismissing VON BISMARK, canceling the gagging ordinance, and respecting the constitution, he cannot gain that support. Ready as the deputies will be to maintain the honor and prestige of Prussia, and to uphold her dignity as a great power, yet they will not stoop to be the tools of their Sovereign, or consent to sustain his pretensions, save on some such terms as we have pointed out; and so WILLIAM will have no alternative but to submit to the chamber, or continue in his present infatuated career, and abandon to the Austrian Emperor the headship of Germany.

Iron Pavements and Steam-Carriages.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

There are several difficulties in continuing the discussion of Mr. J. K. FIRMIN's projects. In the first place, I find it difficult to bring myself on common ground with a gentleman who seriously asserts that horses are "dangerous, difficult to manage and disagreeable," as compared with steam-carriages. Secondly, the controversy is in danger of taking a personal turn. To some extent this, perhaps, is unavoidable. The opponent of any project, like its originator, must either have an interest in the matter or not: if he has none, he may be accused of meddling with what is none of his business, and this is really as grave a charge as the opposite one. I confess to a strong personal interest in the matter. I do not wish to pay largely for the privilege of being banished from the City or compelled to keep a steam-carriage and private stokers of my own. (To be sure, Mr. F. afterward throws out a suggestion about putting horses into sabots or wooden shoes, which I hardly know whether to take as jest or earnest; it is about as good one way as the other.) But because I am personally interested against Mr. F.'s scheme, it does not follow that the scheme is a good one, or that my arguments against it are not perfectly valid. On the other hand, the adoption of Mr. F.'s plan might make him a millionaire or a billionaire, and that would not prove that the plan ought not to be adopted. New-York Aldermen, for instance, have not acquired their peculiar reputation by making money—which, all the moral essays of penny-a-liners to the contrary notwithstanding, will always be regarded as a natural and proper proceeding—but by making it to the public detriment. But whenever a change of this sweeping nature is proposed, the proposer must expect to have it scrutinized from all points of view. I was not in the country in 1843, when Mr. FIRMIN began to write, and may, therefore, be excused for never having read his writings or heard of him before. I can only judge of him by his two recent communications to your paper. The first made me suspect that he was an illogical reasoner; the second confirms this impression, and also shows that he has an extraordinary prejudice against that noble animal the horse, whom he accuses of being "directly or indirectly the cause of all the dirt in our streets"—in the face of the notorious fact that the dirtiest streets in our City are not those most frequented by horses.

Thirdly, the discussion is assuming a scientific character. Now, I make no pretensions to scientific knowledge; any information of the kind which I happen to possess, is entirely exoteric—that is, partial and got up for the occasion. Thus, when Mr. F. tells me that the coefficient of friction is 0.28, he might have said that it was 0.32, or 0.19, for any answer I could make him before consulting the proper authorities. With all his scientific attainments, however, I am by no means sure that he always states his case fully and fairly. I had a vague idea that, while it was possible to blow off steam noiselessly, there were reasons of economy or convenience against its being generally done; otherwise it would be more generally done—just as in countries where bituminous coal is largely used, chimneys may be made to consume their own smoke, but very few chimneys do so. And even now, despite his summary disposition of this objection, I am not quite certain that he has disposed of it, for reasons developed in the second and third questions at the end of his letter.

Again MORIN (he says Morin; is this a misprint, or another of Mr. F.'s jokes, to insinuate that I am ass in the subject?) gives 0.29 as the coefficient of friction. "This means," says Mr. F., "that if a person weighs 100 pounds it would require a force of 29 pounds to trip him or slide his feet." Begging Mr. F.'s pardon, it means nothing of the sort. MORIN speaks of bodies pushed or dragged along, rolling or sliding. A man walking is not such a body. He is propelled by a series of impulses at various angles, no two impulses exactly alike, and every step modifying the problem.

Let us come to positive facts. He says that the iron sidewalks, &c., already in use, are not more slippery than stone. My health has not allowed me to experiment on them in wet weather, or any weather, but every person of my acquaintance who has tested gives a very different report.

"Moreover, I believe, in opposition to horse engineers, that a horse with a light carriage, gently driven, can trot safely with iron shoes on cast-iron floors, &c., &c. This opinion is based on observations of driving on the smooth pavements of Naples."

Now on this point I happen to be très fort, (well shod or well ironed, as the French say—the moral is appropriate to the subject—having had considerable experience of riding over the streets of the three principal Italian capitals. The pavements of Florence, Rome and Naples are exactly similar to the eye, but from some causes unknown to me—possibly a difference in the texture of the stone—while that of the first-mentioned city is quite safe to ride on, that of the second is very slippery, (so that all the carriage-horses are nailed on their hind feet, or they would not be able to go down hill,) and that of Naples extremely slippery and dangerous. Had Mr. F. carried out his observations of driving in Naples as carefully as I did, he would have noticed an unusual number of broken knees among gentlemen's horses, (although they rarely go into the city proper at all,) and he would have seen the poor brutes who draw the hired carricoli tumbling about like harlequins in a pantomime. I can speak feelingly on this subject, having once ridden five miles on Neapolitan pavement, and I never knew before what riding for a man's life meant.

Before proceeding to any second batch of questions, I have one more remark to make. Mr. FIRMIN seems to me an amiable enthusiast in the matter of clean streets. That one who has suffered from the dirt of ours should consider that dirt the first of sublunary evils, is perhaps pardonable; that the majority of manual labor and the great success of labor-saving contrivances indoors for the supply of water, light, &c., should tempt the wish to be able to keep the streets clean without cleaning them, is not unnatural. But I hesitate to believe that either a house or a city can ever be put into, or kept in a state of cleanliness without the direct agency of manual labor. The formation of dirt is a necessity of human life. Cleanliness is the removal rather than the prevention of it. Even the famous Dutch village of Broek—which has expelled from its limits, not only Mr. FIRMIN's special antipathy, the horse, but also the faithful dog and the harmless, unnecessary cat—does not pretend to dispense with the broom and the brush. Our people have never seen the City properly cleaned. Should Sanitary Boards succeed in showing them how this can be done, perhaps Mr. FIRMIN's tender sensibilities may be appeased. He is remembered, also, that this labor is not wholly unremunerative in other respects—street dirt being a valuable manure. I now proceed to my other questions:

1. What does Mr. FIRMIN suppose would be the cost of removing all the stone pavement in the City, sidewalks included, and replacing it with iron?

2. Can a cheap steam-engine be made sufficiently portable and small to be attached to an ordinary cart

[illegible] Mr. Y. seems to forget this and overrunnes his own case. I am speaking of rapid like steps of steamships.

3. Admitting the [illegible] of ordinary construction, in the future of steam? Mr. F's [illegible] of a single "factory," not a hundred miles from this City, (as their makers say,) which, being unexpectedly called to exceed an [illegible] somewhat steeper than it was prepared for, entirely [illegible] its [illegible], not exactly by friends, but quite as much to its inventor's [illegible].

4. Is not a great deal of extra power required to exceed an incline like that of Murray Hill, for instance, and would not this interfere with the economy of the engine?

5. Does it not require a skillful engineer to direct a steam-carriage safely? and how long would it take to make all our drivers skillful engineers?

6. Can a steam-carriage, however skillfully driven, be stopped and set in motion as readily as a horse vehicle? For instance, can it start from a gait of 4 miles an hour, make a spurt of 50 or 100 yards at the rate of 16, 12 or 14 miles an hour, and then be pulled up to a full stop in a length? for this is what a City driver is constantly obliged to do.

These are questions enough for the present. Stay a little more. Will Mr. Fenton kindly instruct us how to fix on a convenient and economical machine for the purpose of making two old boots revive respectively upon steed and iron? C. A. BRISTED.

AFFAIRS IN ENGLAND AND ON THE CONTINENT.

The English Iron-Clads—The Florida at Brest—Mexican Recognition—Who Will be Emperor—Mr. Seward's Message to Europe—National Debt—Gov. Seymour—A New Times Correspondent—"Guy Livingstone"—British Sympathy and the Negro—Rp. Roebuck—European Affairs—Velocipedes.

LONDON, Saturday, Sept. 5, 1863.

The more striking and decisive the successes of the National arms, the stronger is the determination of England not to interfere in the quarrel.

In the meantime, the Florida lies in the harbor of Brest, repairing her machinery. She is visited by sympathizing Englishmen, and Capt. MAURY opens his champagne and is jolly. The Monitor explains clearly that the Emperor, having recognized the Confederacy belligerents, they have a right to call their vessels in French ports, and to procure everything except munitions of war. If a pirate, just issued in Paris, had the inclination many wish to crack it with, a further, though somewhat roundabout, recognition is not far off. The new Empire of Mexico is to recognize the Confederacy. This will incommode nobody, only that the Emperor is bound to hoist the new Empire. If that lead to war with the United States, then there will be a general settlement of affairs and boundaries, of which I have given some intimations.

But who is to be Emperor of Mexico? Not a word more of our Austrian Maximilian. There was a rumor that he had sent an Aid-de-Camp to Mexico to see if he was really wanted. A report, also, that he had gone to ask the advice of his father-in-law, King Leopold, of Belgium. It is by no means certain that a French Emperor will not be sent over after all. The Mexicans would like it better. Nothing is settled; and there must be an Emperor before the new Empire is in a condition to recognize anybody or thing.

England, as she boasts, is the most free and the most prosperous of nations—and England has the largest national debt in the world. Yet Englishmen think America must be crushed and ruined by a debt half as large as her own. The annual revenue of the United Kingdom is, in round numbers, $400,000,000, of which $100,000,000 is the interest on the public debt. Yet all this taxation does not crush Great Britain, and it is not difficult to show that it is an element of strength. Every holder of as much as £10 of that debt—every member of the smallest portion of that yearly pay—is interested in the support of the Government.

The hopes based upon resistance to the conscription have passed away. Gov. SEYMOUR was a hero here until he was tried and found wanting. When he took those emphatic oaths to maintain the sovereignty of the State of New-York, wrote those impressive letters and made those eloquent speeches, people thought he was in earnest. State Rights stock was at a premium. The trial has come. President LINCOLN quietly fills the City of New-York with National troops, and so quietly drafts out as many soldiers as he requires. Gov. SEYMOUR is nowhere; and the expectant Governor of Ohio, the outlawed VALLANDIGHAM, no longer excites any interest. If the constitutional authorities of New-York have no power to resist the National Government, what can be expected of Ohio?

The late Times correspondent of the Times has been dispatched to America. His last letters are from Albany and Saratoga, and he is on his way to the West to see if he can find among the débris of the war or in any lower political strata, any feeble remains of State Rights doctrine, or any indications of further revolutions. He has the idea that the seat of power in America is in the West, and that it is the Western people who will finally decide the pending contest. They told him at Albany—that is, SEYMOUR & Co. told him—that the great cities in populous States east of the Alleghanies were of no consequence; but that the West was tired of the war and would soon dictate terms of peace. So the Italian gentleman, who is, I believe, a Count, is on his travels, in the hope of finding enlightenment in the Valley of the Mississippi. He spoke a day in Saratoga, and took a letter of introduction from Gov. SEYMOUR to the expectant Governor of Ohio, just now starting with the Canadian at Niagara Falls.

The author of Guy Livingstone, who went to America to have a campaign with the Confederates and write a book, has done the latter, and is very sorry after it is. He was taken prisoner in attempting to get to his Southern friends, and his book describes six weeks in a "Yankee Bastile" instead of a campaign in Virginia." He lost his labor, lost his health and will not get much sympathy. The British officer who gives his experiences in Blackwood, has better fortune, and has done all that can be done to increase sympathy for the Southern cause.

This sympathy crops out in the queerest places. The British Association at Newcastle discussed the negro, as a question in ethnology, and the papers dwelled with Dahomey, negro civilization in Africa, his improvement under the "peculiar institution," and his manifest destiny. The Times of this morning has a plea for Slavery, such as a few years ago, would have startled England into hysterics. Yesterday the Master Cutler of Sheffield gave a dinner and Mr. Redmond made a speech in which he told Sir CHARLES WOOD—the city member of the Government—present—warned him, indeed, in a very solemn manner, amid tears and groans, that the people would hold the Government to an account for their miseries were allowed to continue much longer. That is, "You can give the cotton if you will. Why don't you? The Emperor invited you to join him long ago, and now we are starving, and it is your fault."

There are rumors from Paris today a week, that the Emperor is about to interpose. The French-Mexican pamphlet is, however, the only article of news, and that may be the Italian short sketch, which will probably draw to it with the news of the evacuation of Fort Wagner.

European affairs are managed exactly in the direction of the Freeman Chapman. The great Congress of German Kings had adjourned. It hopes that it has done something toward German unity, or a permanent, strong confederation—but a federation of kings, of independent sovereigns, contains too many elements of promise to be of much value. And what is a German Federation good for, which leaves out Prussia?

Russia gives the wind out of the sails of the Western Powers by a project for granting to all Russia more than was demanded for Poland. INTERESTING FROM THE SOUTH.

SPIRIT OF THE REBEL PRESS

The Mechanics of Richmond Feeling the Pressure of Hard Times.

MISCELLANEOUS INTELLIGENCE.

SPIRIT OF THE PRESS.

LINCOLN'S TROUBLES.

From the Richmond Whig.

Lincoln's armies have so dwindled from death, disease, secession and expiration of terms of service, that three months ago he was constrained to call for three hundred thousand recruits. The call has been poorly responded to. The Pope has signified to his American Primate his desire that the war shall end. This cures the war fever in Paddy. No more Irish Catholics can be had as food for Confederate powder, like Meagher's Brigade at Fredericksburgh. Nor the Yankees recruits any more easily had. The rich buy themselves off, and the poor are bought off by the corporations. The Dutch are nearly all in the war, or have been in and have had enough of it. The principal recruiting going on is by Lincoln's press-gangs among the negroes. We know not what cost of soldiers they make. On our side the Conscription levies regularly at work, bringing in all between 18 and 45, and daily adding hundreds to the service as they reach the fourteen age. In addition, the States are organizing effective forces below and above these ages for local service. Mr. Ryan was right when he said that in future the enemy would have but little if any advantage of us in numbers. Lincoln can only carry on his campaigns successfully by calling in half-drilled militia to fill up his ranks. We can do the same, and have done it.

In less than three months a Congress will meet, the majority of whom were elected on a platform of opposition to his Administration. It will be, too, the Congress preceding the Presidential election, famous always for every species and degree of faction and intrigue. That they will leave nothing undone to hamper and embarrass him, to defeat his policy and secure odium on his name, with the hope of extinguishing his chances for a reelection, we are justified in believing, from the course of all previous Congresses. For it is not to be supposed that the war swallows up every thing in the United States. The spirit of party rages there as furiously as ever. The lust for office, for power and spoils has risen and swollen in proportion with the enlargement of power and spoils in the hands of the Executive occasioned by the war. The Ins never so dreaded to be out, and the Outs never so longed to be in. The engineering and wire-working by which the question is to be settled will be managed by the Congress that meets in December. They will settle the minute and important questions.

Then will come on the great contest for the Presidency, such a contest as was never seen in this or any other country—the first contest of a Government for a certain time, of the right to sole and to carry arms. The grants of land which our enlightened, after the war, can justly claim, should be taken as within the limits of the Southern Confederacy. The large cities of the South should be garrisoned by negro regiments, to be furnished and paid for by the South herself.

This, says the Chronicle and Sentinel, is the original punishment intended for the South and her native sons. Time, however, has made the feelings of the war sons of the North more bitter, and their hatred stronger, as now announced, by the Press and Sets, proves that nothing but the complete devastation, as well as subjugation of the South will satisfy the fiendish passions that burn within their breasts.

THE MECHANICS IN RICHMOND.

The depreciation of the currency is falling severely upon the laboring classes in the South, as the report of a meeting of mechanics held in Richmond on Aug. 19, which we find in the Enquirer of Monday last, proves. The report says:

"The meeting was organized by calling Mr. BENJAMIN BAKER to the Chair, and appointing Mr. ARCHIBALD GARY Secretary. Mr. BAKER, on assuming the duties of Chairman, explained in a few pleasant remarks the purpose for which the meeting assembled. He attributed the present high prices more to the engrossers and speculators than to any fault of the Government. Every man wages and earns all he can, and gets what he can for it, and the price of provisions must go until new wages could not live.

On motion the Chairman appointed a Committee of five, consisting of Lieutenant John McDonald, Wm. Taylor, Thomas S. Ca Trents and R. R. Robinson, to prepare business for the meeting. When the Committee retired.

Mr. ANDREW GARY having been called for, proceeded to make a few remarks. He said that a certain class of men who produce nothing, rule and govern us; such a state of things was wrong. He then petition the Legislature to right the matter.

At this point the Committee came in, and through their Chairman, Mr. ROBINSON, reported the following preamble and resolutions:

"WHEREAS, We have arrived at one of the most important periods in the history of the present revolution, considering as we are for the independence of these Confederate States, which every man who loves his country or desires an honorable peace, must pray for; which we are convinced, the people who are now working hard at Richmond, a large number of whom are employed by the Confederate Government, in consequence of the exorbitant and usurious rates of the necessities of life, believing the same to be equally as patriotically the enjoyment of the fruits of legislation, (Confederate States Stock,) and the great and unprecedented change which has taken place in a comparatively short period, against laborers and mechanics as well as every other class, including the families of our brave soldiers in the field; therefore,

"Resolved, THAT a Committee of seven be appointed to lay before the Legislature of this State, and through it to request them to adopt some plan, if it be within their contract and obligation law enjoyment, to stop the raging speculation in the prime necessities of life, and reduce prices to a reasonable standard, and that they be instructed to request our Senators and Representatives in the Confederate Congress to adopt a similar measure.

"Resolved, That we pledge our loyal citizens, we pledge ourselves to Robert E. Lee the last extremity the Government of our choice, support as it is in a glorious struggle for our independence; but we earnestly ask the people of this section, that we will meet the Government half complaint, and place as humane a position that we may be enabled to support our families and relieve us from the grasp of the extortioner and the money-changer.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting are hereby tendered to our brave troops in the field, and we pledge ourselves to the support of their families, and that our sympathies are with them, and that the great object of this meeting is to benefit them and their families, and that we will meet the Government half complaint, and place as humane a position that we may be enabled to support our families and relieve us from the grasp of the extortioner and the money-changer.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting are hereby tendered to our brave troops in the field, and we pledge ourselves to the support of their families, and that our sympathies are with them, and that the great object of this meeting is to benefit them and their families, and that we will meet the Government half complaint, and place as humane a position that we may be enabled to support our families and relieve us from the grasp of the extortioner and the money-changer.

Mr. ROBINSON then offered the presentation of the report with a short and pertinent speech. He looked on this meeting as pregnant with great events. There was a time when impatience, called to be a virtue, and he thought that time had arrived. He proceeded to make some the signs of commission merchants who keep boxes of chickens and tomatoes before their doors, and put up that of "huckster." He said we must petition the Legislature to remedy the differing evils. The Yankees rely more on this than the ability of our armies to defend their heavens.

On motion, the Chairman was authorized to appoint the Committee of seven called for under the first resolution. The Committee were accordingly appointed, as follows: E. H. Robinson, A. Gary, W. Taylor, J. E. Taylor, J. Hallman and C. Pendleton.

On motion, the Chairman of the meeting was added to the Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON urged the propriety of continuing some to go to the council and endeavor to provisions to be sold to consumers in the city at reduced prices.

A motion to adjourn to next Saturday night week was adopted.

DOGS VS. YANKEES.

Mr. J. M. McCUE, a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, recently addressed a note to a Mr. FERRYMAN, who seems to be a practical tanner, asking his opinion regarding the value of dog skins from several points of view. He received a reply, from which the following is an extract:

"The immense number of useless dogs in the State would go far toward furnishing a substitute for both sealing leather and dressing it. The per cent. of all other oils used now in the South, will not amount to five per cent. The value of calf and dog skin leather for ladies' wear, and for Summer boots for gentlemen is nearly the same. The value of green calf skins is about double that of dogs. The dog skin is tough, soft, pliable and as easily equal to kid as any material that can be used. The quantity of oil that can be extracted from a medium-sized dog will amount to only one and a half gallons. The carcasses can then make a valuable ingredient in the mire heaps of the city, as does the offal of the carcasses of horses and cattle returned to. To the extent of one hundred and twenty millions of dogs, ought to be found in every town and village in the country, and the proceeds of the sale of the dog skins, and the oil and manure, would be a source of wealth to the State. In the West, the dog skins are used for glove leather, and the oil is used for lubricating machinery, and the manure is valued highly as a fertilizer. Yesterday we saw a lot of dog skins in the hands of a glove manufacturer, who was paying 75 cents per skin for them. Yesterday, the price of dog skins was 50 cents. Leather is so in the price of the several kinds of oil. Neatsfoot oil sells for from $15 to $20 per gallon; fish oil is worth nearly or quite as much; lard oil about the same; rosin oil is worth about $4 per gallon. We pay one dollar per pound for tallow and oil from the carcasses of the dogs and the cow, or from $8 to $10 per gallon."

To this the Whig adds the following note:

The number of dogs in the State, according to a low estimate, is 600,000. Each dog will yield say one gallon of oil:

600,000 gallons at $15 ⅌ gallon	$9,000,000
600,000 skins at 50 cts average per pound	4,500,000
600,000 skins at $20 for dressed	12,000,000
Total	$25,500,000

The estimated number of sheep in Virginia is 600,000, which at $2 ⅌ head, are worth $1,200,000. Estimated value of sheep destroyed by dog (deducting $20,000). These facts commend themselves to the attention of the Legislature and the Press.

THE WAR IN TENNESSEE.

The following paragraphs are from the Chattanooga Rebel, now published at Marietta, Ga.:

"A party of Nashville, who recently came through the lines, reports that some ten or twenty thousand horses passed through that city before she left, to be used by ROSECRANS for mounted infantry. No doubt he contemplates setting down quietly in Chattanooga this Winter, and amuse himself by sending out raiding parties to destroy the products of the defenceless widows and orphans on the farms in North Alabama and Northwest Georgia. We trust that he will not be disappointed in the pretty little programme.

"We are informed that President DAVIS was heard to exclaim in a circle of friends at the capital, that he would abandon Tennessee from the sixteen of the Abolitionists, if it took the united strength of the South to accomplish it. From the signs of the times, it begins to look very much as if that obstinate man meant what he said. We begin to believe now that we shall be driving our quill in the capital of Tennessee before another month has passed.

"Gen. BRAGG is fortunate in having a galaxy of higher military talent, and backed by a larger army than he ever before commanded, having his whole military career. Post, Hindman, Buckner, Hardee, who will perhaps command a corps, CHEATHAM, STEWARD, LOVING, CLEBURNE, WALKER, with those veterans of the Saddle, FORREST, WHEELER, WHARTON, SCOTT, PEGRAM, JOHNSON, and a host of others, equally efficient and experienced, comprise his able corps of assistants.

"A well-planned movement for the capture of a strong position of the enemy was defeated on Saturday, by the failure of the Commander to whom was intrusted the business of cutting the enemy off in the rear, to come up.

The Memphis Appeal (Gov.) says: "It is yet to be developed what military strategy there was in yielding up Chattanooga to the enemy, and we shall confess ourself an enthusiastic admirer of that which shall dislodge him. It may be, as in chess, the sacrifice of the queen in order to induce a speedy checkmate. We shall see. We hope that Gen. BRAGG was never in better spirits, or higher hopes, and shall rejoice with our whole heart when he shall emerge in triumph from the difficult straits in which he seems at present to be placed."

THE VICKSBURGH PRISONERS.

From the Augusta (Ga.) Constitutionalist.

The Confederate prisoners paroled at Vicksburgh, belonging to STEWARTSON's and BOWEN's divisions, have been officially notified of their exchange. The other Vicksburgh prisoners were not exchanged, owing to the absence of their master lists. Gen. STEWARTSON's division, are rendezvousing at present at Decatur. Bowen's division are at Demopolis. Not a hundred of the division, we learn, are absent.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

—The Columbus Sun says it was thought some time since, when the Government agents were trying to purchase bacon with Confederate notes, at 60 cents per pound, that bacon had become extinct in the country. The general belief was that there was none in the country. But when the Government received a large lot of bacon, and commenced exchanging that article for tacon, many persons were forced to change their opinion. Over 10,000 pounds of bacon were taken during a single week.

—The Selma (Ala.) Reporter says: "We noticed a beautiful, warm, by a lady refugee, who was on her way to rejoin her husband, a day or two ago, that we could not help admiring. It was about an inch and a half square, made of fine gold, and its full face represented in colored enamel, except the thirteen stars, which were minute diamonds—the battle-flag of the Confederate States. The pin had been manufactured in Paris, and sent by private conveyance to the fair owner as a Christmas present. It was certainly one of the prettiest articles of jewelry that we have seen for some time."

INTERESTING FROM NEW-ORLEANS.

The Texas Expedition—Troops Moved Rapidly.

The United States steam transport Colorado, Lt. P. Bunce commander, arrived here yesterday at 3 o'clock, from New-Orleans, Sept. 17, at 8 A. M., and from the Bar at 6 P. M. same date, with mails and 400 bales of cotton to United States Quartermaster. She experienced heavy northeast gales from Tortugas.

On Sept. 25, 20 miles north of Carrollton Light, exchanged signals with the United States navy supply steamer Bermuda, bound south.

We learn by the Colorado that the troops which were engaged in the Sabine Pass expedition have been disembarked, and are to comprise a part of the expedition overland to Texas.

The troops were on the departure of the steamer, moving towards Brazoria City and Berwick Bay, as rapidly as by the railroad transportation between Algiers and those points, they could be sent forward. The force which originally was to go by that route will thus be so much strengthened as to render the expedition a formidable one.

It is stated on good authority that our forces were crossing Berwick Bay, with their trains, and that a part of the troops are already on their march westward.

The occupation of Texas by our troops is regarded in New-Orleans as a fixed fact.

The Gulf Blockading Squadron—A good Day's Work—The Steamer Fox Run Ashore and Burned—Two Blockade Runners Captured.

From the New-Orleans Era, Sept. 17.

By the arrival of the United States transport Tumbleton in the Mississippi River, we are in possession of the following late and important news from the Gulf Blockading Squadron, and have also received Mobile papers of the 19th inst. We give the report of the movements of the Tumbleton.

At 12 o'clock M. on Saturday, the 12th inst., the Tumbleton left the fleet off Mobile for Ship Island, and at 4 o'clock P. M. of the same day made a heavily rigged steamer, a little forward of the port beam, which proved to be the United States steamship San Jacinto. At the same time two steamers, both having soft pine, were observed—one directly ahead, and the other on the port bow.

The Tumbleton immediately gave chase to the one in front of her, and was rapidly overhauling her, when she headed for Ship Island Pass and succeeded in getting in before the Tumbleton could come up with her. Eleven shots were fired at her, by the latter, but they did not succeed in disabling her.

The gunboat at the Pass, however, gave the vessels inside the Sound timely warning of her approach, and the gunboats J. P. Jackson and Calhoun started in pursuit. After a short chase, these ran her ashore and burned her. She proved to be the steamer Fox, recently captured at Pass-a-l'Outre. She was completely destroyed.

As soon as the Fox was inside the Pass, where the Tumbleton could not follow her, the latter joined the San Jacinto in the pursuit of the other steamer. Her superior speed enabled her to gain rapidly upon the chase, who, seeing that there was no other chance of escape, ran in behind the Chandeleur Islands.

In the meantime, the gunboat Eugenia, which was lying at Ship Island, among the vessels in pursuit, had left Ship Island, and was coming down the Sound, when she saw a steamer coming out from behind the Chandeleur Islands, and immediately gave chase. The chase lasted for the lower part of the Sound, with the result that the steamer escaped, knowing that could they succeed in reaching the outlet first her capture was inevitable.

The chase had now become a very exciting one, all the vessels going at their utmost speed. On nearing the lower end of the island, Tumbleton was nearly abreast of the rebel vessel, and the Eugenia was not more than three miles behind her, when the captain of the chase gave up all hopes of getting away, and ran her ashore.

An armed boat was lowered from the Tumbleton and sent off to the prize; but before it succeeded in reaching her, the Eugenia had steamed up and taken possession of her.

The steamer proved to be the Alabama, from Havana, bound to Mobile, with a valuable assortment of cargo. She is a beautiful steamer, light draft and fast. She had been chased the day previous by the San Jacinto, but was the last day her. The De Soto had also pursued her, but continued on each day. The Tuscaloosa is one of the famous vessels in the Blockading Fleet, and has been chased by almost every one, but escape if they once cross her path in deep water.

The East Gulf squadron have an advantage over that of the West in connecting results with a "running acquaintance," like the San Jacinto and De Soto, and complaints are made by the latter that these rovers fly to seaward of them, pick up their prizes and quite prize money at the same time, giving them no showing whatever to gain either glory or profit. Their commander seems to be of the opinion that the Tuscaloosa are equally awful, and they are not allowed to cruise in the same way.

When the Tumbleton rounded Pass-a-l'Outre, she found there the gunboat De Soto, with the prize steamer Montgomery, which she had captured the same day the above event occurred.

The capture or destruction of three prize steamers in one day is very good business indeed.

NEWS FROM WASHINGTON.

A "TALK" WITH A POTTAWATAMIE CHIEF.

Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, C. E. MIX, Esq., to-day had a "talk" with the Indian Chief Capt. Gamas, and his two brothers, of that portion of the Pottawatamie tribe of Indians who refused to remove from Iowa to their reservation in Kansas, with the main portion of the tribe, some years since. The band of which the Captain is Chief, is all number about 450 men, women and children, and are represented as being in a very destitute condition. They have a piece of land only eighty acres in extent, which is insufficient for them to raise enough for their support.

The Acting Commissioner told them that their Great Father was displeased at their coming here again to trouble him after he had told them so distinctly, when here before, that if they expected to receive assistance from the Government they must join the rest of the tribe, and that at once, as the land was being taken up so rapidly that ere long there would be none for them, and they would be forever debarred from receiving help from the United States. He further said that the Secretary of the Interior had decided to furnish them with a full of clothes and provide them with transportation to their homes, with the understanding, however, that they are not to come here again, but must join the rest of their tribe.

The Chief in reply, said that he was sorry that their Great Father "felt bad" about their coming here for assistance, but the Treasury waites in Iowa, owing their destitution, advised him to make the fact known to the authorities here. He expressed a willingness to remove to Kansas, but offered in extenuation of their conduct for not having done so before, the fact that the Government or its agents failed to make good the promises made them as to the amount and quality of the goods to be furnished them upon their removal. He asked for a copy of the talk to show the people and persuade them to accept the offer of the Government.

LATER FROM PANAMA.

PANAMA, N. G., Thursday, Sept. 17.

By newspapers and private advices received a few days ago from Bogota, we learn that the Government and clergy of that city, who have been at loggerheads for some time past, have at last come to terms. You will remember the priests refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new Constitution, whereupon the authorities prohibited them from performing any of the rites of the church.

The Priests taking indignant at this treatment, immediately closed all the places of worship, thinking thereby to gain the sympathies of the people. The move does not appear to have had the desired effect, as the majority seem to get along quite as well with the houses of God closed, as when they were open.

The most apparent result of the course pursued by the distinguishing of the influence of the Church over the people. On the 6th of August the Vicar and other clergy of the Capital took the oath required of them by the authorities, and on the same day the tolling of bells announced the churches again opened.

The Bishop of Popayan also took the oath of allegiance on the 14th ult., and it is not improbable that the Holy Fathers remaining here will follow the example.

The steamer Tacie, from Guayaquil, arrived in this port on the night of the 17th inst. In the mailes brought by her there is nothing of importance. The interview between the Presidents of Colombia and Ecuador, appointed for the 15th ult., had not taken place, but was expected to come off on the 25th ult. President Mosquera had not left Quito up to last advices.

As it seems is said to exist between President MOSQUERA and MORENO, which some persons think will involve the two republics in a difficulty. The Moreno Government is said to be rather inclined to temporize just now. A large number of troops have arrived there lately, and few believe would be a great firmness over the Administration.

The United States gunboat Saginaw, Capt. HOWKINS, arrived on the afternoon of the 14th instant from Acapulco. She will probably after remaining here two or three weeks, return North.

The authorities here are taking some interest in the cultivation of cotton on the Isthmus. Some seed of superior quality has been procured, and President SARACCONOZA has ordered it to be distributed to parties wishing to engage in the cultivation of the staple. Persons receiving the seed will be required, when the crop has matured, to furnish the Government with an account of the result. By this means it will be decided whether or not the soil and climate of the Isthmus is adapted for raising this valuable product.

The cultivation of cotton has already received some attention in this section. With proper energy and intelligence, it is not improbable that before long Panama Cotton will be quoted in the United States and European markets.

No arrivals from South America, except the Tacie, and none from Central America since last advices.

COLOMBIA.

No Important News—Aspect of the Situation.

[From Our Own Correspondent.]

PANAMA, Thursday, Sept. 17, 1863.

The mails from Central, South America, and from Bogota, are not due for four or five days, so we are without news from those points.

The United States gunboat Saginaw, Capt. Le Roy, Selwyn, arrived at Panama on the 14th. The relative positions of the forces of Guatemala, Salvador and Nicaragua were, about the same as my last letter left them. Reports will reach us, however, that Gen. MARIANO, President of Salvador, is daily improving his chances of driving away the Guatemalians; but no great reliance can be put in these reports. It was said that the City of San Miguel, Salvador, was getting disenchanted with the presence of the Nicaraguans, who continue to, and would take the first favorable opportunity to pronounce in favor of SARNIER.

The British steamship Tacie, from Guayaquil and Colombian coast ports, arrived at Panama three days since. Admiral was quiet, but President MOSQUERA and his Government were in apprehension of an early attack from President MORENO, of Colombia. Mosquera left Popayan, the capital of our neighboring Pacific State of Cauca, on the 24 of September, for Pasto, on the frontier of Ecuador, to hold a conference with President MORENO. Before he left he issued a message to the Legislature and people of Cauca, in which he declares strongly against the illiberal tendencies of the rulers of Ecuador, and says the people of that Republic must have the aid of the Caucanos to restore republican government. He charges that MORENO is the plot to split out the South American people to European Governments, and, indeed, intimates that he has already sold out Ecuador to France, by asking a French Protectorate. No doubt there is a comprehensive scheme between France and Spain, and perhaps with the aid of England, to restore these Republics to their former owners, or to divide them between them. The Spanish fleet, on this coast, which pretends to be a scientific expedition, is feeling about the coast, spying into the condition of things among us, and ready to take a warlike attitude in case matters should be precipitated in the grand scheme.

A day or two since, the Agent of the General Government notified the keepers and servants of the convent here, that they must evacuate the premises in order that they might be used for a school, within two hours, previous notice to that effect having been disregarded. The nuns, it will be recollected, had gone to Lima some months since, refusing to submit to the new National and State Constitutions. As soon as the persons for the convent received this last notice, they, with some friends, commenced immediately, under cover of the high walls, to destroy the magnificent garden they contained, as also other property of the establishment. Lime was dumped trees were cut down; pretty fountains and other ornaments were torn up; the stones and dragged into the adjacent streams, into the water wells; in fact, the whole enclosure was made a perfect wreck. Decent people are much scandalized at this outrage, and many good Catholics are preparing to incorporate a religious system, that forces its priests to shut the doors of the churches against worshipers, and refuses the rites of sepulture to those who have all their lives looked the feet of their people relegated.

The United States sloop-of-war St. Mary's, is at Panama. No war-ship at Aspinwall.

The Panama Railroad Company's brig Secore, from New-York, arrived at Aspinwall last evening.

The British mercantile propeller Crusader, from Liverpool, is in port and will sail in a few days for England.

MISCELLANEOUS INTELLIGENCE.

BOSTON, Saturday, Sept. 26.

The steamship Anglia, from Galway on the 16th inst., arrived at this port this afternoon. Her dates are two days later than those already received.

The regular newspaper parcels and dispatches were left at St. Johns, N. F., at which point the Anglia touched.

The telegraph wires to that point appear to have been out of order for some days.

No commercial advices have been received by the Anglia.

Advices from Cherbourg in the Courier du Havre state that the Confederate steamer Alabama will probably visit that port, and a letter addressed in Captain SEMMES gives some foundation to the rumor.

PARIS, Sunday, Sept. 13.

The Pays of this evening believed itself able to state that the Maximine Pretender of Brest has suspended the return of the Confederate steamer Florida, in consequence of its order from Paris, issued by the Prefect receive, with the object of preserving the inviolability of the harbor as a military port.

The gates of Warsaw have been closed, for nine days to any persons desiring to enter or go out of the city. Two hundred of the inhabitants have been transported to Siberia.

The reply of Prussia to the collective letter of the German Princes will not be a collective answer, but will be sent separately to each sovereign who signed the letter. The reply will merely publish the reasons of Prussia for not accepting the Austrian project of reform, touching upon hardly any other point, and certainly not bringing forward any counter proposals.

The same paper states that a circular has been issued by the Father Provincial of the Capuchins to the Basilicata and at Palermo, according the invitation of the Ministry relating to the assistance of the clergy in repressing Brigandage.

COPENHAGEN, Sunday, Sept. 13.

The King of the Greeks signed the agreement relative to the succession to the Danish throne yesterday.

She saw all the pickets at that place on fire. Four United States gunboats and one transport were lying off the Point. No further particulars were ascertained.
